Bibliographical Abbreviations

All bibliographical abbreviations used in this dictionary are listed below, following the typography used in the text of the dictionary. Broadly, italic type is used for periodicals and for reference works; roman type is used for anthologies, series etc. (titles of individual volumes are italicized).

Full bibliographical information is not normally supplied in the list below if it is available elsewhere in the dictionary. Its availability is indicated as follows: D – in the list of 'Dictionaries and encyclopedias of music'; E – in the list of 'Editions, historical'; and P – in the list of 'Periodicals'; these lists are located in vol.28. For other items, in particular national (non-musical) biographical dictionaries, basic bibliographical information is given here; and in some cases extra information is supplied to clarify the abbreviation used.

Festschriften and congress reports are not generally covered in this list. Although Festschrift titles are sometimes shortened in the dictionary, sufficient information is always given for unambiguous identification (dedicatee; occasion, if the same person is dedicatee of more than one Festschrift; place and date of publication; and name(s) of editor(s) if known). For fuller information on musical Festschriften up to 1967 see W. Gerboth: An Index to Musical Festschriften and Similar Publications (New York, 1969). The published titles of congress reports are generally reduced to their essentials, but sufficient information is always given for purposes of identification (society or topic; place and date of occurrence; journal issue if published in a periodical; editor(s) and publication details in unfamiliar cases). A comprehensive list of musical and music-related 'Congress reports' appears in vol.28. Further information can be found in J. Tyrrell and R. Wise: A Guide to International Congress Reports in Music, 1900–1975 (London, 1979).

Library Sigla

The system of library sigla in this dictionary follows that used by Répertoire International des Sources Musicales, Kassel, as listed in its publication RISM-Bibliothekssigel (Kassel, 1999). Below are listed the sigla to be found; a few of them are additional to those published in the RISM list, but have been established in consultation with the RISM organization. Some original RISM sigla that have now been changed are retained here.

More information on individual libraries is available in the libraries list in volume 28.

In the dictionary, sigla are always printed in italic. In any listing of sources a national sigillum applies without repetition until it is contradicted.

Within each national list, entries are alphabetized by sigillum, first by capital letters (showing the city or town) and then by lower-case ones (showing the institution or collection).

A Note on the Use of the Dictionary

This note is intended as a short guide to the basic procedures and organization of the dictionary. A fuller account will be found in the Introduction, vol. l, pp.xix–xxix.

Abbreviations in general use in the dictionary are listed on pp.vii–xi; bibliographical ones (periodicals, reference works, editions etc.) are listed on pp.xiii–xviii and discographical abbrevations on pp.xix–xx.

Alphabetization of headings is based on the principle that words are read continuously, ignoring spaces, hyphens, accents, bracketed matter etc., up to the first comma; the same principle applies thereafter. 'Mc' and 'M'' are listed as 'Mac', 'St' as 'Saint'.

Bibliographies are arranged chronologically (within section, where divided), in order of year of first publication, and alphabetically by author within years.

Cross-references are shown in small capitals, with a large capital at the beginning of the first word of the entry referred to. Thus 'The instrument is related to the BASS TUBA' would mean that the entry referred to is not 'Bass tuba' but 'Tuba, bass'.

Signatures where the article was compiled by the editors or in the few cases where an author has wished to remain anonymous are indicated by a square box (□).

Work-lists are normally arranged chronologically (within section, where divided). Italic symbols used in them (like D-Dl or GB-Lbl) refer to the libraries holding sources, and are explained on pp.xxi–xxxvii; each national sigillum stands until contradicted.

Kufferath. German (later Belgian) family of musicians.

(1) Johann Hermann Kufferath (b Mülheim, 12 May 1797; d Wiesbaden, 28 July 1864). Violinist, conductor and composer. As a child he showed a natural talent for music; his father, a great music lover, gave him his first music lessons. He subsequently studied with the cellist Joseph Alexander, and later with L. Scheffer (a pupil of Spohr), Spohr and Hauptmann. He was not only a gifted violinist but also an accomplished conductor; at the age of 15 he was leader of a military band, and he subsequently conducted in Mülheim, Duisburg, Bielefeld and elsewhere. In 1823 he was made music director of Bielefeld. From 1830 to 1862 he was active as director of the Collegium Musicum Ultrajectinum in Utrecht and of the Utrechter Gesangverein, where he conducted works by Haydn, Mozart, Handel, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Spohr and Schumann. He spent the last years of his life in Wiesbaden.

Kufferath's compositions, primarily cantatas, overtures and motets, show clearly the influence of Weber, Spohr and Mendelssohn, and originality and a sound compositional technique. But he is chiefly known for his 32 years' leadership of the musical life of Utrecht, where he reformed the concert repertory thoroughly.

(2) Louis Kufferath (b Mülheim, 10 Nov 1811; d St Josse-ten-Noode, nr Brussels, 2 March 1882). Pianist, teacher, conductor and composer, brother of (1) Johann Hermann Kufferath. He received his first musical instruction from his elder brother, then studied with Johann Christian Friedrich Schneider in Dessau. He became a brilliant piano virtuoso and undertook concert tours of Germany and the Netherlands. From 1836 to 1850 he directed the music school in Leeuwarden and conducted the Euphonia-Crescendo, the Grote Zangvereniging (which he founded) and various other musical groups. He moved to Ghent in 1850, where he concentrated mainly on composition; subsequently he established himself in Brussels.

His musical work, comprising primarily piano pieces, is typical of 19th-century salon music.

(3) Hubert-Ferdinand Kufferath (b Mülheim, 10 June 1818; d St Josse-ten-Noode, 23 June 1896). Violinist, pianist, conductor, teacher and composer, brother of (1) Johann Hermann Kufferath. He, too, was a musical child prodigy; at scarcely the age of seven he tuned church organs, and soon afterwards appeared in public as a violinist and a pianist. His brothers gave him his first musical instruction; later he studied with F. Hartmann in Cologne and with Schneider in Dessau (1833–6). In 1839 his superb performance on the violin at a concert in Düsseldorf attracted the attention of Mendelssohn, who invited him to Leipzig. There he studied the violin with David, and afterwards studied with Mendelssohn and Hauptmann. In 1841 he conducted the Männergesangverein in Cologne for six months, and after travelling a while as a virtuoso established himself in Brussels in 1844, where he taught the piano and composition. He also conducted a choral society there and, together with Léonard and Servais, founded a series of chamber concerts by which the music of Schumann, among others, was disseminated in Belgium. His home became the meeting-place of such eminent musicians as Wieniawski, Bériot and Clara Schumann. In 1872 Kufferath was made professor of counterpoint and fugue at the Brussels Conservatory, a post he held until his death. His pupils Edouard Lassen, Arthur de Greef and Edgar Tinel praised his thorough technical understanding of music.

His works, which include symphonic, choral and chamber music, songs and piano pieces, are strongly influenced by Mendelssohn. Of greater significance is his single theoretical work, Ecole pratique du choral (Brussels, n.d.), which was used widely in Belgium and France.

(4) Maurice Kufferath (b St Josse-ten-Noode, 8 Jan 1852; d Uccle, nr Brussels, 8 Dec 1919). Writer on music, conductor and cellist, son of (3) Hubert-Ferdinand Kufferath. He had his first music lessons with his father, then studied the cello with Adrien-François Servais and Francois-Mathieu Servais; subsequently he studied law and art history in Brussels and Leipzig. In 1874 he became a writer on foreign politics for Indépendance belge and in the following year became editor of Le guide musical. From 1890 to 1914 he was chief proprietor of this music journal, which enabled him to defend his Wagnerian ideas. Together with Guillaume Guidé, Kufferath directed the Théâtre de la Monnaie in Brussels from 1900 to 1914. There he conducted the operas of Wagner and other German, French and Italian works, including those of Strauss (Elektra and Salome), Dukas (Ariane et Barbe-Bleue), Debussy (Pelléas et Mélisande) and Galeotti (Dorise). Among the operas first produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie are Chausson's Le Roi Arthus, Albéniz's Pepita Jimenez and Blockx's La fiancée de la mer. During World War I Kufferath travelled in Switzerland, where he wrote for periodicals and delivered numerous lectures on art. He returned to Brussels in 1918 and again directed the Théâtre de la Monnaie.

Today Kufferath is known chiefly for his writings on music, especially the monographs on Wagner's operas.

She studied with Julius Stockhausen and Pauline Viardot-Garcia and made her début in Berlin in 1878. A specialist in the songs of Schumann and of Brahms (she gave the first public performances of some of them), she had faultless diction and a fine voice that won great admiration at the Schumann festival in Bonn in 1880. In 1882 she sang in England; three years later she married Edward Speyer and gave up her career.

Kugelmann, Johann [Hans] (b Augsburg, *c*1495; d Königsberg, late July or early Aug 1542). German composer, brother of PAUL KUGELMANN. From 1518 to 1523 he was a trumpeter in the imperial Hofkapelle in Innsbruck, and may have been a pupil of Hofhaimer. He was employed by the Fugger family in Augsburg for a short time before going to Königsberg as a trumpeter and composer at the court of Margrave Albrecht V of Brandenburg (later Duke of Prussia). From 1534 he was first trumpeter and Kapellmeister there, and was in charge of the Kantorei until 1540. He composed pieces for two Königsberg songbooks of 1527 (facs., Kassel, 1933) as well as melodies and some polyphonic pieces for a manuscript collection of sacred songs by Heinrich von Miltitz (*c*1539, formerly in the Staatsbibliothek Königsberg, MS 334). Kugelmann's Concentus novi (Augsburg, 1540), for school and church use, was commissioned from Sylvester Raid by the Fuggers and Duke Albrecht. It contains 39 sacred pieces, 30 of which are by Kugelmann (ed. in EDM, Sonderreihe, ii, 1955). His musical style, though furnishing a model for Johannes Eccard, was conservative. His technical ability is shown above all in the eight-voice setting, in the form of a canon at the fifth, of Nun lob, mein Seel, den Herren; the melody, an adaptation by Kugelmann of the song Weiss mir ein Blümlein blaue, was printed here for the first time. Three songs (one of which is doubtful) are in DK-Kk Gl.Kgl.Saml.1872.

Kugelmann, Melchior. German 16th-century trumpeter and composer, brother of JOHANN KUGELMANN.

Kugelmann, Paul (b Augsburg; d Königsberg, Bavaria, 1580). German composer and trumpeter, brother of JOHANN KUGELMANN. He went to Königsberg, probably in 1542, after Johann's death. He is first mentioned as a trumpeter in the Hofkapelle in 1548, and was first trumpeter during the periods 1549–53 and 1575–80. In 1558 he published in Königsberg the collection Etliche teutsche Liedlein, geistlich und weltlich, containing 121 polyphonic lieder, among them 88 by Kugelmann (7 ed. H. Engel, Sieben teutsche Liedlein aus P. Kugelmanns Sammlung 1558, Königsberg, 1937/R; incipits of the whole print in CaM, ix 1979). He was a conservative musician: he frequently took the tenor straight from older lieder books, and his old-fashioned settings are not always very skilful. Paul Hofhaimer and Caspar Othmayr appear to have been his models. A six-voice Benedicamus by him is in DK-Kk Gl.Kgl.Saml.1872. He also wrote a few occasional pieces (now lost) for Duke Albrecht and his son Albrecht Friedrich.

Kugelmann's brother Melchior (b Augsburg; d Königsberg, ?1548) was a trumpeter in the Königsberg Hofkapelle from 1540 to 1548 and had perhaps studied there. Nine pieces by him were included in Etliche teutsche Liedlein. Another brother, Christoph (b Augsburg; d Königsberg, 1531), went to Königsberg in 1527 as a trumpeter in the Hofkapelle. Paul Kugelmann's son Barthel (b Königsberg) was a trumpeter in the Königsberg town watch from 1567.

Kuhač [Koch], Franjo Ksaver [Xaver, Žaver] (b Osijek, 20 Nov 1834; d Zagreb, 18 June 1911). Croatian ethnomusicologist and music critic. He studied privately with Thern at Leipzig in 1856 and in the same year with Liszt at Weimar; he then studied for a short time with Czerny in Vienna. He gave piano lessons in Osijek (1858–71), then moved to Zagreb in 1871 where he was music critic for the papers Narodne novine and Agramer Zeitung. He lost this position in 1874 following the demands of the Opera management, who disliked his harsh tone. From 1872 he taught music theory and piano at the Croatian Music Institute, but left in 1876, disapproving of its pro-German orientation.

Kuhač was a pioneer of ethnomusicology in Croatia. Over a number of years he made regular excursions into various Slavonic provinces in the Balkans, both within and outside the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The folksongs he collected were first published in 1878, and by 1881 he had brought out four books containing 1600 songs. The remaining 400 songs from his collection were prepared for publication by Božidar Širola and Vladoje Dukat in 1941. He displayed many shortcomings in classifying the melodies, and when adding the piano accompaniment he overlooked many special characteristic elements of the folk idiom. The collection nevertheless was the first important step in the development of ethnomusicology in Croatia and exercised a powerful influence on a whole generation of Croatian composers. He was a prolific writer, and apart from numerous studies on the nature of Croatian and south Slavonic folk music he wrote about early Croatian Romanticism and campaigned forcefully for a Croatian national style in music. He pointed out the Croatian origin of several of Beethoven's and Haydn's themes but was often carried too far by his imagination. Thus in 1880 he put forward his theory about Haydn's Croatian ancestry which even attracted some followers abroad: in England it was accepted by W.H. Hadow.

BOJAN BUJIC

Kuhe, Wilhelm (b Prague, 10 Dec 1823; d London, 8 Oct 1912). British pianist, administrator and composer of Bohemian birth. He studied in Prague with Josef Proksch (1833–6) and Tomášek (1840–43), and had some lessons with Thalberg. In 1844–5 he made a successful concert tour throughout Germany, then visited London with the singer Pišek; there he played with success at the Musical Union in a trio by Mayseder on 13 May 1845. From 1847 he lived in England, giving an annual concert and teaching at the RAM from 1886 to 1904. He organized an enterprising festival at Brighton (1871–82), where he commissioned and performed many new works, including music by Cowen, Gounod (the scena Oh happy home), Benedict, Macfarren, J.F. Barnett, George Osborne and Prout. His programmes became famous both for their high quality and their extreme length. The 1882 festival included an ambitious performance of Elijah with Albani, Trebelli, Edward Lloyd and Santley. His original compositions include many piano pieces, among which are Lieder ohne Worte op.12, Le carillon op.13, Romance sans paroles op.17, Le feu follet op.38, fantasias on the British and Austrian national anthems and numerous operatic fantasias.

As a young man, Kuhe heard first-hand stories of Mozart and the première of Don Giovanni from Wenzel Swoboda, a double bass player at the National Theatre, Prague, on the occasion of the first production, was impressed by the playing of Hummel, Kalkbrenner and Moscheles, and himself played to Metternich; he lived to hear, and often admire, virtuosos whose careers lasted into the middle of the 20th century. His book My Musical Recollections (London, 1896) gives a lively and entertaining picture of the many musicians with whom he had personal and professional contacts in his long career, and includes vivid accounts of many of the leading singers of the day (especially Jenny Lind) and of Tomášek, Liszt, Rossini, Bülow, Chopin, Berlioz and Rubinstein, among many others. His son Ernest (b Brighton, 1870; d London, June 1936) worked as a music critic, especially for the Daily Telegraph.

Kuhglocken (Ger.). See COWBELLS.

Kuhlau, Friedrich (Daniel Rudolph) (b Uelzen, nr Hanover, 11 Sept 1786; d Copenhagen, 12 March 1832). Danish composer of German birth. Together with C.E.F. Weyse he was the foremost representative of the late Classical and early Romantic periods in Denmark.

Kuhlau was the son of a poor military bandsman and moved with his family to Lüneburg about 1793, where in 1796 he lost his right eye in a fall in the street. After brief periods in Altona and Brunswick, the family settled in Hamburg in 1802 or 1803. Here Kuhlau received his first serious musical tuition, partly from C.F.G. Schwencke, the Stadtkantor and Musikdirektor of Hamburg and a learned scholar who had been taught by C.P.E. Bach and Kirnberger. Kuhlau gave several piano recitals from 1804, and the same year his earliest known compositions, songs and pieces for flute and piano, were published. When Hamburg was invaded by Napoleon's troops in 1810 Kuhlau fled to Copenhagen, where he gave the first of many concerts in January 1811, performing among other works his C major Piano Concerto. He began to earn his living as a piano teacher and composer, and in 1813 was appointed court chamber musician, though he received no salary for this first position until 1818. In 1814 his first stage success, the Singspiel Røverborgen ('The Robbers' Castle'), was given at the Kongelige Teater (the Royal Theatre). He was chorus master at the theatre in 1816–17 and had his second opera Trylleharpen ('The Magic Harp') produced there in 1817. He enjoyed an enormous success with his fairy tale opera Lulu (1824), and his incidental music to the play William Shakespeare (1826) was also well received. But the greatest triumph of his career was the incidental music to Heiberg's Romantic national play Elverhøj ('The Elf Hill'), first produced in 1828. As a direct result of this Kuhlau was made a professor the same year. His other stage works were failures. He went on concert tours as a pianist in Scandinavia, especially in Sweden, and made several visits to Germany and Austria. In 1816 he conducted a successful performance of Røverborgen in Hamburg, and in 1825 met Beethoven in Vienna, exchanging impromptu canons with him. Kuhlau's last years were clouded by financial problems, illness, excessive drinking and the deaths of both of his parents, who had lived with him from 1814. As a result of a fire that swept his house in 1831 he suffered a chest ailment from which he never recovered, and died the following year.

Kuhlau wrote music in all the main genres except church music. More than half of his works are for piano solo and piano duet, the most important of which are several sonatas in the grand style, the easy sonatinas, still popular as teaching pieces, and sets of variations on folksongs and operatic themes. These works reveal the influence both of the Viennese Classical composers and of the virtuoso piano writing of Clementi, Dussek, Cramer, Hummel and Weber. His numerous compositions for one, two, three and four flutes and for flute and piano were written to satisfy popular demand for such works and thereby augment his income, although several of them transcend mere charm. Kuhlau was not a flautist himself, but had a natural instinct for writing for the instrument. His other chamber music forms a small but valuable group of works: four sonatas for violin and piano, of which the first and finest, in F minor, was dedicated to Spohr; a graceful trio for two flutes and piano; three piano quartets, of which the most personal is the second, in A major; three fine quintets for flute and strings; and his final composition and chamber masterpiece, the String Quartet in A minor, which was partly inspired by Beethoven's Quartet op.132 in the same key. Kuhlau's orchestral works comprise two piano concertos, of which the first in C major is strongly influenced by Beethoven's First Piano Concerto and the second, in F minor, is lost, and a charming Concertino for two French horns and orchestra.

Kuhlau's songs, most of them to German texts, are overshadowed by those of Weyse, though there are a number of fine ones among them. Often more personal in tone are his songs for four-part male chorus, many of them in praise of nature or wine. A particular speciality of Kuhlau's were his canons, mostly enigmatic and published in the major periodicals, but also including the ingenious comic canons for three male voices. He also wrote a number of cantatas, notably a setting of Schiller's An die Freude (only fragments of which have survived) and some lyric-dramatic scenes including Eurydice in Tartarus.

By far Kuhlau's most important vocal compositions, however, are his stage works comprising five operas and incidental music to three plays, which introduced the latest European trends to the somewhat conservative Danish repertory. Røverborgen, a kind of 'rescue opera', draws on the principal operatic genres and forms of the time: Italian opera seria and opera buffa, French opéra comique as well as German, Austrian and Danish Singspiel. According to the composer himself, his principal models were Mozart, Cherubini and Paer. Trylle-harpen was a failure and caused something of a scandal, largely because the text was thought, wrongly, to have been stolen; but with its many through-composed scenes it surpasses Røverborgen dramatically. His third opera, Elisa (1820), set in the time of the crusades, suffers from a very undramatic text, but has some new features, including incipient influences from Rossini. Kuhlau's chief operatic work is the fairy or magic opera Lulu, which draws on the same literary source as Mozart's Die Zauberflöte. His operatic style had now become more Romantic, with strong suggestions of Weber and Rossini; but the tuneful melodies and the richly coloured harmony have an individual stamp and help to make Lulu one of the outstanding Danish operas. His last opera Hugo og Adelheid (1827) is based on a static love story with echoes of Romeo and Juliet, but is enlivened by the inclusion of many subordinate characters and situations (thieves, competing knights and merchants, a nightwatch and prisoners) and contains some of Kuhlau's most personal operatic music, especially in the buffo scenes.

Kuhlau's incidental music includes the evocative music to C.J. Boye's Romantic play William Shakespeare (based on a legend from the playwright's youth about poaching and rivalry with the local squire), which is very similar to (and dates from the same year as) Weber's Oberon and Mendelssohn's overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Still more Romantic in character is his music to Elverhøj, Kuhlau's most successful work and the most often performed play in the Danish repertory. It is largely based on old Danish and Swedish folktunes skilfully arranged to fit the dramatic situations, above all the tune Kong Christian stod ved højen mast ('King Christian [IV] stood by the lofty mast'), which became the Danish national anthem. Less inspired is Kuhlau's last stage work, the incidental music to Oehlenschläger's comedy Trillingbrødrene fra Damask ('The Triplet Brothers from Damascus') which contains some 'Turkish' effects.

Unlike Weyse, the other principal Danish composer of the period, Kuhlau was extrovert and modern. His style contains many elements of the Danish musical tradition but is mainly cosmopolitan. A conspicuous feature is his parody technique, in which themes, passages and sometimes whole movements by other composers function as a catalyst for his own compositions. However, Kuhlau has his own distinctive artistic character, and his best works – the piano, flute and chamber music and the dramatic works, including several masterly overtures – exerted a profound influence on Danish music during the rest of the 19th century.

Kuhlmann, Kathleen (b San Francisco, 7 Dec 1950). American mezzo-soprano. After attending the Lyric Opera Center for American Artists, Chicago, she made her début in 1979 as Maddalena (Rigoletto) with the Lyric Opera, with which she also sang Bersi (Andrea Chénier) and Princess Clarice (The Love for Three Oranges). She made her European début in 1980 at Cologne as Preziosilla (La forza del destino), followed by Rosina and Nancy (Martha). In 1982 she made her débuts at La Scala as Meg Page and at Covent Garden as Ino/Juno (Semele), returning to Covent Garden as Carmen and, in 1992, as Bradamante (Alcina). Kuhlmann's other roles include Monteverdi's Octavia and Penelope, Gluck's Orpheus, Cenerentola (the role of her Glyndebourne début in 1983), Dorabella, Nicklausse and Charlotte (Werther), which she sang for her Metropolitan début in 1989. She has a rich, vibrant tone, an agile florid technique and an exciting dramatic temperament, as can be heard in her recording of Bradamante.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Kühmstedt, Friedrich Karl (b Oldisleben, nr Weimar, 20 Dec 1809; d Eisenach, 8 Jan 1858). German composer and teacher. He received his early musical education from Zoellner in Oldisleben, then studied the piano with Hummel in Weimar, and the organ and music theory with C.H. Rinck in Darmstadt. A virtuoso career was curtailed by damage to his right hand through overwork, and he turned to composition; his first works, including the opera Die Schlangenkönigin, were not very successful. Hummel supported his appointment in 1836 to the Gymnasium in Eisenach. Kühmstedt made a valuable contribution to music in that city, as teacher, director of church music and Kapellmeister. With Liszt he drew up a plan for the reform of musical life in Weimar. This stimulated the foundation of the Grossherzogliche Orchesterschule by Kühmstedt's pupil Carl Müller-Hartung. International recognition followed, including membership of the Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst in 1846.

Kühmstedt's output spanned post-Classicism and early Romanticism. His technique was contrapuntal, with the music of Bach serving as a model for his preludes and fugues, chorale harmonizations and motets. He developed a parallel technique in his pedagogical works, which include organ pieces, a book of chorales, children's studies, a Vorschule zu Sebastian Bachs Clavier- und Orgelkompositionen and the intriguing Das kleine wohltemperierte Clavier. Other works, influenced by the formal clarity and chromaticism of Spohr and Mendelssohn, include an oratorio, Sieg des Göttlichen (first performed by Spohr in Kassel, 1843), three symphonies, a Missa solemnis, a Fantasia eroica, ballades, choral songs and lieder. His style, said to have had 'inner wealth, without ostentation or affectation', aimed to display 'the stirrings of the spirit to arouse corresponding feelings through sounds' as expressed in the preface to his Theoretisch-praktische Harmonien- und Ausweichungslehre (Eisenach, 1838), a work based on the aesthetics developed by G. Weber and J.M. Fischer, and thus an early exponent of Riemann's theory of harmonic function.

Kuhn, Gustav (b Turrach, 28 Aug 1947). Austrian conductor. He studied at the Salzburg Mozarteum and with Swarowsky, Maderna and Karajan in Vienna. He was first conductor at the Turkish State Opera, Istanbul, 1970–73, making his début with Fidelio; artistic director, Netherlands Opera Forum, 1974–5; and first conductor, Dortmund Opera, 1975–7. He conducted Elektra for his Vienna Staatsoper début in 1977 and remained as resident conductor until 1980. While music director at Berne, 1979–83, he made his débuts at Glyndebourne (Die Entführung, 1980), Covent Garden (Don Giovanni, 1981), the Opéra and Chicago Lyric Opera. Subsequent engagements were at Bonn (from 1983), La Scala (Tannhäuser, 1984), Rome (1985) and the S Carlo (1986). A versatile conductor, Kuhn is noted for his command and conviction in Strauss and Wagner. His Italian experience included the Pesaro revival of Rossini's Ermione (1987), and he has also staged a number of productions himself, including Der fliegende Holländer in Trieste, Parsifal and La Bohème in Naples, and Capriccio in Parma. While his interpretations have sometimes been regarded as heavily Germanic, he has equally been praised for his brio and fancy, as his recordings of Schumann's choral works show.

NOËL GOODWIN

Kuhn, Theodor. Swiss firm of organ builders. The firm was founded in Männedorf, near Zürich, by Johann Nepomuk Kuhn (1827–88). He was succeeded by his son, Carl Theodor Kuhn, after whose death in 1925 ownership of the company passed to family friends, who with their successors control the company. By 1876 it had built organs for such important cathedrals as St Gallen and the Zürich Grossmünster, and by 1900 had exported widely, especially to France.

The company has always been noted for its progressiveness, and has patented several major technical innovations, such as the 'System Kuhn', developed in 1891 for the firm's first tubular-pneumatic organ. It responded quickly to the Orgelbewegung: the Berne Minster organ of 1930 was built with slider-chests and a Rückpositiv (but electro-pneumatic key- and stop-actions), and the 1937 organ at Fribourg was Kuhn's first instrument with slider-chests and mechanical key- and stop-action. In 1964 it built its last electric action organ, and since then, under the guidance of Friedrich Jakob, who became associated with Kuhn in 1963 and director in 1968, the firm has specialized in the development of modern mechanical action organs. Kuhn is noted for responsive key actions, imaginative case design, excellent reed stops and superior craftsmanship and tonal finishing. The tonal design of Kuhn organs is generally more cosmopolitan than that of other European organs, fitting them for a wide range of organ literature. Modern playing aids are utilized. Some of their notable modern organs are in St Gallen Cathedral (1968), the Predigerkirche, Zürich (1970), Alice Tully Hall, Lincoln Center, New York (1974, designed in collaboration with Lawrence Phelps), the Symphony Hall of Asahi Broadcasting Corporation, Osaka (1982), and St Kunibert, Cologne (1994). Through Jakob's scholarly expertise the firm has restored important historic instruments, such as the Bommer organ of 1736–41 in the St Katharinental convent, near Diessenhofen (1965–9), and the Gabler-Organ of 1737–50 at Weingarten (1982); it has also constructed new organs in a specific historical style, such as the organ after Andreas Silbermann for St Leonhard, Basle (1969), created within the old Silbermann cases, and the organ after Antegnati for the Nydeggkirche, Berne (1995).

GILLIAN WEIR

Kühn [Kühne, Kün, Kun], Tobias (b c 1565; d ?after 1614). German court musician. Originally from Halberstadt, he was appointed on 15 November 1587 to a musical post at the court in Wolfenbüttel, primarily as a singer but also as a lutenist. He can be traced in court pay records up to 1591. His compositions for the lute are few and unremarkable. The 'Pavana T. K.' in Rude's Flores musicae (Heidelberg, 1600[5a]) is attributed to him, as are another pavan and two galliards in Fuhrmann's Testudo gallo-germanica (Nuremberg, 1615[24]), a fuga and the 'Gagliarda Tobie' in the lost lutebook of Joachim von Loss (formerly D-Dlb B 1030), and the 'Galiarda Tobiae Kuhnen' in D-LEm II.16.5 (the Długoraj Lutebook). H.B. LOBAUGH

Kuhnau [Kuhn, Cuno], Johann (b Geising, Erzgebirge, 6 April 1660; d Leipzig, 5 June 1722). German composer, keyboard player and music theorist. He was Bach's immediate predecessor as Kantor at the Thomasschule, Leipzig, and a major figure in German music of the late Baroque.

1. Life. Kuhnau's family had originated in Bohemia, whence they fled during the Counter-Reformation because of their Protestant faith. Their name was Kuhn. Johann seems to have adopted the form 'Kuhnau' only after arriving in Leipzig, and it was assumed too by his brothers Andreas and Gottfried, who were also musicians (Johann also briefly used the form 'Cuno' when first applying for the post of organist at the Thomaskirche, Leipzig); the other members of the family, however, retained the name Kuhn (see Münnich for the family history). According to his autobiography published in Mattheson, Kuhnau gave early evidence of his scholarly potential and also had a fine voice. About 1670, therefore, he went to Dresden to study. This exceptional educational and musical opportunity had probably been arranged by Salomon Krügner, a court musician at Dresden who, according to Mattheson, was Kuhnau's cousin. He studied briefly with Krügner but soon became a pupil of the court organist, Christoph Kittel. In February 1671 he joined his elder brother Andreas as a chorister at the Kreuzkirche, where he was taught by the organist, Alexander Heringk. His musical talents brought him to the attention of the court Kapellmeister, Vincenzo Albrici, who, Kuhnau said, praised his youthful compositions highly and allowed him to mix with his own children and to attend rehearsals of the court orchestra. At this time he began to study Italian and French, the languages employed in court circles. In 1680 a plague epidemic forced him to return home. He remained at Geising only briefly, however, for towards the end of the year he accepted the invitation of Erhard Titius, formerly of the Kreuzschule, to further his education at the Johanneum, the Gymnasium at Zittau, where Titius was now Kantor. The organist of the Johanniskirche, Moritz Edelmann, died on 6 December, shortly after Kuhnau's arrival, and Titius himself died in May 1681. Until the position of Kantor was filled by Johann Krieger in spring 1682, Kuhnau, as praefectus chori (i.e. first singer of the choir), was asked to act as Kantor, and also as organist of the Johanniskirche. These musical experiences were further enriched by his close association with Christian Weise, Rektor of the Gymnasium; he wrote music (now lost) for some of Weise's school dramas. In 1682 he completed his schooling and (again following his brother Andreas) became a law student at the University of Leipzig. At the same time he applied for the post of organist at the Thomaskirche which had recently been vacated by Albrici. Though his application was unsuccessful, his musical talent impressed the town council. While at the university he became increasingly active as a composer and performer in Leipzig, and when the post of organist at the Thomaskirche again became vacant in 1684 he was appointed to it, and he took charge in October.

For the next four years Kuhnau continued to study law while carrying out his duties as organist, and following the publication in 1688 of his dissertation, De juribus circa musicos ecclesiasticos, he began to practise law. In 1689 he married; he had eight children, of whom three daughters survived him. The next ten years or so were a happy and productive time for him: his fame as an organist grew, his legal practice was highly successful, he published all his keyboard collections, which were his most popular music (see illustration), and wrote his important satirical novel, Der musicalische Quack-Salber. He also found time for further self-education, making himself proficient in mathematics, Hebrew and Greek, and translated into German a number of French and Italian books. Although no documents support the conjecture, it can be assumed that during this period he also wrote sacred vocal music for performance in the several churches of Leipzig, including the Thomaskirche, where the Kantor was Johann Schelle (who also came from Geising). Schelle died on 10 March 1701, and almost immediately Kuhnau was elected his successor, assuming the position in April. As Thomaskantor he reached the pinnacle of his career. He was exceptionally well qualified for the post, not only as a musician and composer but also as scholar, linguist and philosopher, and he carried out its heavy musical and teaching demands with distinction. He taught several classes in the Thomasschule, including singing, and he directed church music at both the Thomaskirche and the Nikolaikirche, where the choirs consisted of students from the Thomasschule. From 1711 he also directed music at the Peterskirche and, on important holidays, at the Johanniskirche. As Thomaskantor he was also director of music for the university and responsible for the city musicians and for the care and inspection of the organs of the Thomaskirche and the Nikolaikirche.

During the last years of his life Kuhnau suffered constantly from ill-health and grew deeply dissatisfied with the deteriorating conditions at the Thomasschule. The number and quality of young voices available for the choir at the Thomaskirche declined as the students were enticed away to perform at the Leipzig opera. When the young Telemann arrived in 1701 as a law student, he immediately established a rival musical organization in the form of a collegium musicum, which attracted some of Kuhnau's pupils. Telemann managed to obtain permission from the mayor to write music for the Thomaskirche: this blatantly undermined Kuhnau's authority, and he was powerless to prevent it. Much the same privilege was granted to Melchior Hoffmann when Telemann left Leipzig in 1705. Moreover, one of Kuhnau's own pupils, J.F. Fasch, attempted to interfere further with his musical responsibilities by proposing to establish another collegium musicum in the university and by trying to take over the direction of the music at the university and the Paulinerkirche, but Kuhnau managed to forestall him. In 1703, during one of his several periods of illness, the town council too annoyed Kuhnau by asking Telemann to succeed him should he die. Despite his difficulties, however, he had the satisfaction of teaching many excellent students, including Graupner and Heinichen. He was greatly esteemed by many of Germany's foremost musicians and was the last of the many-sided Thomaskantors, a man who 'displayed an element of medieval universality and mastered music, law, theology, rhetoric, poetry, mathematics and foreign languages' (Schering, 1926). Scheibe put him alongside Handel, Keiser and Telemann as one of the major German composers before Hasse and the Grauns, and Mattheson, paying equal tribute to his musicianship and his erudition, claimed never to have known his like as composer, organist, chorus director and scholar.

2. WORKS. Kuhnau's surviving music belongs to two categories: keyboard music, nearly all published by 1700, and sacred music, mostly cantatas and all of it unpublished. His secular vocal works are all lost. His reputation as a composer rests almost entirely on the four printed sets of keyboard pieces, especially the last of them, the Biblische Historien. This consists of six multi-movement 'sonatas', each prefaced by a prose description of a particular incident from the Old Testament illustrated in the music: The Fight between David and Goliath; Saul cured by David through Music; Jacob's Wedding; Hezekiah, Sick unto Death and Restored to Health; Gideon, Saviour of Israel; Jacob's Death and Burial. Kuhnau emphasized in a learned and valuable preface that this type of programme music was not new, and he referred to models by Froberger and 'other excellent authors'. His purpose was to demonstrate, among other things, how keyboard music, without the benefit of a poetic text, could capture the emotional states emanating from an action or the description of a character. The various sections of each sonata bear Italian subtitles as clues to the particular emotional state or action being described by the music. For example, the second sonata begins with 'The sadness and the fury of the king', which is followed first by 'The calming song from David's harp' and finally by 'The tranquil and contented soul of Saul'. As with other keyboard works by Kuhnau, these sonatas are quite simple both melodically and, on the whole, harmonically. The rather naive programmatic details are, however, sustained by a rich variety of rhythms and especially textures: massive chords, often in both hands, motivic interplay in the manner of the style brisé, poignant dissonances, rapid toccata-like passages, and fugal sections. Each of the two parts of the Neue Clavier-Übung contains seven suites, those in the first in major keys, those in the second in minor keys. The suites have the same basic series of movements. They usually begin with a prelude and continue with an allemande, courante, sarabande and gigue; in a few the gigue is omitted entirely or replaced by another dance or an aria, and no.4 of the second set begins with a ciacona. A particularly interesting work is the Sonata in B♭ appended to the second part. Becker claimed that this was the first ever keyboard sonata, but, as more recent research has shown (see especially Newman, 1953–4), Kuhnau was simply following a tradition, already established in the keyboard music of other countries, in which composers used the styles and forms of the instrumental ensemble sonata. His sonata is, however, the earliest known work of its type published in Germany.

More than half of Kuhnau's known vocal compositions, of which there were originally over 100, have been lost, and of those known to be extant only a handful have been published in modern editions (see Rimbach, however, for transcriptions of almost all the church cantatas). Critical opinion has generally dismissed the cantatas as routine and uninspired, though competently composed. Such judgments are not borne out by the music itself. While Kuhnau's cantatas are to some extent modelled on those of Knüpfer and Schelle, his predecessors at the Thomaskirche, they are on the whole simpler in style, at least in their melodic and harmonic elements. But they are far from mediocre; on the contrary, most of them are strikingly beautiful and often dramatic. They show a stability of formal structure previously unknown in German cantatas that strongly anticipates the Leipzig cantatas of Bach (Kuhnau's successor as Thomaskantor). The cantatas usually begin with an instrumental introduction (designated 'sonata') followed by an alternation, in the solo works, of aria and recitative or, in the choral works, of chorus, aria and recitative in various orders. Many of the arias, though brief, have a da capo structure and are markedly more lyrical than the songlike movements found in earlier German cantatas. Some of the cantatas open and close with chorales, a few of which are given instrumental concertato settings. The chorale, however, plays only a minor role in Kuhnau's conception of the cantata, and only two of the extant works are true chorale cantatas. The most impressive elements in the cantatas with chorus are the elaborately constructed choral movements, which include frequent dramatic shifts between homophonic sections and powerful, often complex fugues; such a structure gives various kinds of rhetorical emphasis to the poetic texts (a number of which are by Neumeister). In these works Kuhnau created a musical oratory which, according to his own detailed comments regarding cantata texts (see Richter: 'Eine Abhandlung'), was uppermost in his mind in his efforts to write church music that was untainted by the tendency towards the secularism arising from the growing popularity of opera.

Kuhnau is also important for his informative, highly amusing novel, Der musicalische Quack-Salber, which he modelled on Weise's Politische Quacksalber. The story concerns the life of a pompous, ill-trained musical charlatan in 17th-century Germany. His adventures in various social settings contemporary with Kuhnau's own life prompted fascinating observations about the social status of musicians, various musical practices that Kuhnau criticized by means of satire (for example faulty text underlay, over-elaborate thoroughbass realizations, the questionable art of the castrato and the general ignorance of singers) and musical institutions, such as a description of a collegium musicum. The book is of great value to an understanding of the musical and social history of the Baroque period in Germany.

GEORGE J. BUELOW

Kühnau, Johann Christoph (b Volkstädt, nr Eisleben, 10 Feb 1735; d Berlin, 13 Oct 1805). German composer and conductor. He was apprenticed to a town musician in Aschersleben, then from 1753 at Klosterbergen he studied to become a teacher and had keyboard lessons from Martin Grosse. In 1763 he became a schoolmaster at the Realschule in Berlin; there he founded a choir, which he conducted until his death. He published for the choir a series of largely religious Chorarien with keyboard accompaniment. He probably had further lessons in harmony and composition from Kirnberger in the late 1770s. In 1783 he became a teacher and in 1788 Kantor and musical director at the Dreifaltigkeitskirche in Berlin. He did much to stimulate musical life there by conducting performances of large-scale choral works. Kühnau compiled several volumes of vocal and instrumental works by himself and other contemporary composers, the best-known of which are the Vierstimmige alte und neue Choralgesänge, with a preface dated 1784. The 308 chorales, including only eight by Kiühnau and others by J.S. Bach, C.P.E. Bach and other German organists, were republished from 1817 in smaller editions; up to the tenth edition (1885) the series comprised 336 chorales.

Kühnau's son, Johann Friedrich Wilhelm Kühnau (b Berlin, 29 June 1780; d Berlin, 1 Jan 1848), the editor of the second to sixth editions of the chorales, was an organist at the Dreifaltigkeitskirche from 1814. In addition to writing several organ pieces and four-part chorales, he edited 86 melodies as a Nachtrag zu [J.C.] Kühnau's vollständigem Choralbuche, 1815 (D-Bsb), and a volume of Choralmelodien zu sämtlichen Liedern des Berliner Gesangbuches für evangelische Gemeinen (Berlin, 1838).

Kühnel, August (b Delmenhorst, 3 Aug 1645; *d c*1700). German viol player and composer. In 1657 or 1658 he was living at Güstrow with his father, the musician Samuel Kühnel. In 1661 he went as a viol player to the court chapel at Zeitz. He was active there until 1686, with interruptions. During one of these, in 1665, he went to Paris to study, and he later performed at Dresden and elsewhere. In 1669, when he visited Frankfurt, he was described as a 'musician of the Saxon court'. In 1680–81 he was in Munich, but he decided not to take up an appointment there that would have obliged him to change his religion. He is known to have been in London in 1682 and 1685: the London Gazette for 23 November 1685 announced 'some performance upon the Barritone, by Mr August Keenell, the Author of this Musick'.

In 1686 Kühnel was called from Zeitz to Darmstadt by Landgravine Elisabeth Dorothea to become viol player and director of the instrumentalists under W.C. Briegel, the Kapellmeister, but he had to leave Darmstadt in November 1688 because of the danger of attacks by the French. He is next heard of as director of the instrumentalists at the court at Weimar, and from 1695 to 1699 he was court Kapellmeister at Kassel. His son Johann Michael is also known to have been active as a viol player and as a violinist and lutenist too.

Kühnel was a leading performer on the bass viol and composer of music for it. He published a set of 14 attractive Sonate ô partite (Kassel, 1698), six of which are for two viols, and eight for one, all with continuo; two of them have been listed by Einstein and three edited by C. Döbereiner (Mainz, n.d.).

ELISABETH NOACK

Kühnhausen, Johann(es) Georg (d Celle, bur. 25 Aug 1714). German composer. From the autumn of 1660 he belonged, at first on a probationary basis, to the court band at Celle, the residence of the Duchy of Brunswick-Lüneburg; he was engaged there on a permanent basis as a court musician and singer on 2 January 1661. His name is listed in the court accounts until 1663. As early as September 1661, however, after a probationary course in religion and Latin, he had (with the duke's permission) taken up the post of town Kantor, which included the duties of third teacher at the grammar school. Kühnhausen held this post for the remaining 53 years of his life. In 1668, with the school's headmaster, he set up a new organization of the choir to assist discipline. Kühnhausen married twice and had eight children.

His only known composition is Passio Christi secundum Matthäum (autograph in D-Bsb; ed. in Cw, l, 1938). The main chorale of the song interludes is Ernst Christoph Homburg's 'Jesu, meines Lebens Leben', to a melody by Wolfgang Wessnitzer (organist at Celle court since 1661, town organist 1679–97). Whether it may be concluded from the restriction of the instrumental part to an organ accompaniment that this Passion, generally dated around 1700, was written before the founding of the Celle municipal band in 1676, remains uncertain.

GÜNTER THOMAS

Kühr, Gerd (b Luggau, Carinthia, 28 Dec 1952). Austrian composer and conductor. He studied at the Salzburg Mozarteum (1972–9), where his teachers included Gerhard Wimberger (conducting) and Josef Friedrich Doppelbauer (composition), at the Cologne Musikhochschule (1980–83) with Henze (composition), Swarowsky and Celibidache (conducting), among others, and at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana, Siena (composition), Mainz University (phenomenology) and Salzburg University (history, Magisterium 1978). He has served as répétiteur for the operas of Cologne (1981–4) and Graz (1984–6); as director of the Munich Biennale composition workshop (1990–92) and as professor of composition at the Graz Musikhochschule (from 1995), where he has also directed the Institute for Electronic Music.

Kühr's compositional philosophy has emerged from his belief in the communicative powers of a basic musical vocabulary and in the humanist responsibilities of the artist to society. The melodic gestures, instrumental timbres and historical quotations employed in his works are imbued with an immediacy informed by late 20th-century European culture. His compositions are often generated from a small nucleus of material; he recognizes circular forms as his structural ideal.

Kuhschellen (Ger.). See COWBELLS.

Kuijken. Belgian family of musicians. They are specialists in early music.

(1) Wieland Kuijken (b Dilbeek, nr Brussels, 31 Aug 1938). Viol player and cellist. Members of the family were musicians on both sides, connected with brass bands. Wieland left school at 15 and began musical studies (cello and piano) at the conservatory at Bruges, where the family had moved in 1952. He also studied at the Brussels Conservatory (1957–62; prix d'excellence, 1962). At 18 he began teaching himself the viol. He played in the Brussels avant-garde group Musiques Nouvelles (1962) and, from 1959 to 1972, in the Alarius Ensemble, a group specializing in Baroque music, especially French. After that he played with his brothers in the Kuijken Early Music Group and was much involved in teaching; he has held appointments at the conservatories of Antwerp, Brussels and The Hague since the early 1970s and has conducted many masterclasses. He has appeared frequently at festivals, such as Flanders, Saintes and the English Bach Festival, and toured in Australia and New Zealand with his brothers and Gustav Leonhardt. Artists with whom he has played include Alfred Deller, Gustav Leonhardt and Frans Brüggen.

In the late 1970s Wieland Kuijken came to be regarded as the leading exponent of the bass viol, both as a continuo player, in a wide repertory of French, German, Italian and English music, and as a soloist, in Bach and particularly in the French repertory, notably Marais and Forqueray; he has also played in chamber music of the Classical period, including Mozart and Boccherini. His playing combines care over scholarly detail with a high level of musicianship; it is characterized by its tonal purity, its sense of line, its poise and restraint, and by its seriousness of approach.

(2) Sigiswald Kuijken (b Dilbeek, nr Brussels, 16 Feb 1944). Violinist, viol player and conductor, brother of (1) Wieland Kuijken. He began violin studies at Bruges Conservatory at the age of eight, and from 1960 studied at the Brussels Conservatory under M. Raskin (premier prix, 1964). On the Baroque violin, which he has played since 1970, he is self-taught. His career has followed lines similar to that of his brother Wieland: he played with Musiques Nouvelles for ten years, then the Alarius Ensemble, with whom he toured, playing the viola da gamba as well as the violin. He began teaching the Baroque violin at The Hague Conservatory in 1971 and is a regular participant in festivals involving early music (notably Flanders and the English Bach Festival). In 1972 he was a founder of a Baroque orchestra, La Petite Bande, which he directs and which has recorded a wide range of music, including works by Corelli, Rameau and Haydn and, notably, performances of Handel's operas Partenope and Alessandro, which won much praise for their vivacity and keen sense of style. The group has a distinctive character, with its light textures, sprightly rhythms and unassuming manner. Kuijken has appeared as conductor with other period-instruments orchestras, among them the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, and has recorded the three Da Ponte-Mozart operas and Haydn's 'Paris' symphonies and two late oratorios. His recordings as a violinist include a set of the Bach sonatas with Leonhardt, which won a German award in 1975, and two Mozart discs.

(3) Barthold Kuijken (b Dilbeek, nr Brussels, 8 March 1949). Flautist and recorder player, brother of (1) Wieland Kuijken. He studied at the conservatories of Bruges, Brussels and The Hague, where his teachers included Franz Vester (flute) and Frans Brüggen (recorder); on the Baroque flute he is self-taught. Besides playing with his brothers, he has been a member of the Parnassus Ensemble, the Collegium Aureum and La Petite Bande and has toured extensively. He teaches the Baroque flute at the conservatories in The Hague and Brussels. The width of his repertory is reflected in his recordings, which range from Montéclair, Handel and Telemann (the solo flute fantasias) to Haydn and Mozart (the flute quartets). His playing is notable for its musicianly understanding of Baroque stylistic precepts, its delicately rounded tone and its intelligent and sensitive handling of rhythm.

JULIE ANNE SADIE, STANLEY SADIE

Kuivila, Ron(ald J.) (b Boston, 19 Dec 1955). American composer. He studied at Wesleyan University (BA 1977) with Alvin Lucier and Richard Winslow, among others, and at Mills College (MFA 1979), where his teachers included Robert Ashley and David Behrman. He joined the music department at Wesleyan in 1982. Kuivila's style developed from the disjuncture between Cage's antipathy to recording and Walter Benjamin's belief in the potential for technical reproduction to liberate perception. While his structures generally derive from technical processes, his realized compositions resemble spontaneous improvisations. His first work, The Essential Conservatism of Feedback (1974), established a process of audible self-correction. His interest in motion-sensing spatial fields resulted in Comparing Habits (1978) and Sailing Ship/Flying Machine (1983), both of which function either as concert works or sound installations. In the 1980s he explored compositional algorithms (Loose Canons, 1986–90), high voltage phenomena (Parallel Lines, 1989; Radial Arcs, 1989; Spark Harp, 1989) and speech synthesis (The Linear Predictive Zoo, 1989). Much of his work in the 1990s has taken the form of site-specific, interactive multimedia installations. In Il giardino de Babele (1990) a virtual 'performer' reacts to musical choices made by visitors as they walk over floor tiles that trigger musical pitches; in ShadowPlay (1996) voices in an ongoing composition are changed as visitors cast shadows over light sources.

STEVAN KEY

Kujawiak. Polish folk dance from the Kujawy region. It is characterized by what is usually called the MAZURKA rhythm – triple time with a displacement of the accent to the second or third beat of the bar. The kujawiak may be distinguished from the mazurka by its slower tempo (crotchet = 120–50). The OBEREK has a similar rhythmic character but is usually faster than the mazurka; the kujawiak, by contrast, has longer phrases, greater embellishment and, vocally, a more developed stanza (often based on a three-bar phrase unit). The usual form is ternary, with a faster middle section and an acceleration to the final cadence. The changes of tempo often reflect characteristic preoccupations with sleeping and hunting. It is danced by couples in a circle, who may walk (alternately turning towards and leaning away from each other) or revolve around each other (with hands free or clasped).

Collections of kujawiaks, arranged for piano, were made by M. Miączyński (*c*1830), Oscar Kolberg (1845) and W. Kaczyński (1933). Several of Chopin's mazurkas have sections with kujawiak characteristics and one of the melodies in his Fantasy on Polish Airs op.13 is of this dance type. There are also examples by Nowomiejski for chorus and by Wieniawski for violin and piano. (See also POLAND, §II)

Kulenkampff, Georg (b Bremen, 23 Jan 1898; d Zürich, 5 Oct 1948). German violinist. He studied at Bremen and later (1912–15) with Willy Hess at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, where he himself taught from 1923 to 1926 and gave masterclasses in 1931. He toured extensively in Europe. He was exiled during World War II and succeeded Flesch at the Lucerne Conservatoire in 1943. In his relatively short career Kulenkampff was specially acclaimed in Germany. His death (from spinal paralysis) robbed violin playing of a highly respected musician of individual style and personality, an outstanding performer and a distinguished teacher. His recording of Beethoven's Violin Concerto with the Berlin PO under Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (1936) is still considered very fine. Despite some technical shortcomings, it is a musician's performance suffused with a classical serenity. His memoirs were published as Geigerische Betrachtungen (Regensburg, 1952).

Kulenović, Vuk (b Sarajevo, 21 July 1946). Yugoslav composer. After graduating from the composition class of Srebotnjak at the Ljubljana Academy of Music (1976) he worked in Stuttgart with Milko Kelemen and completed a master's degree under Enriko Josif at the Belgrade University of Arts (1992). He lectured in India in 1992, and taught at the Vučković music school in Belgrade and at the University of Arts. He has since lived in the USA.

Kulenović's works suggest a new sound world capable of strong emotions and primeval forms of expression. Certain works, for example Kvasar OH 471 (1975), use aleatory forms. His musical language, which at times is tonal with modal influences, makes use of melodic and rhythmic formulae, as in Ikar. Some pieces are inspired by the forgotten musics of India, the Balkans and Byzantium.

ROKSANDA PEJOVIĆ

Kulenty, Hanna (b Białystok, 18 March 1961). Polish composer. She studied composition in Warsaw with Kotoński (1981–5) and in The Hague with Louis Andriessen (1986–8), and was fellow of the Deutscher akademischer Austauschdienst in Berlin in 1990–91. The recipient of many commissions, her works have frequently been performed in Poland, the Netherlands and Germany.

Kulenty established the essential parameters of her compositional practice while still a student: works such as Ad unum and Sesto contain percussive rhythm and iterative gestures, while formally they carry a sense of momentum. The clarity of her writing – which varies from unison pedal points to differently paced musical strata, as in Trigon (1989) – is largely the realization of a compositional strategy, the 'polyphony of arcs'. Overlapping or in sequence, these determine small- and large-scale events, and are governed, for example, by chordal progressions, timbral effects or emotional intensity. Much of her material draws on phenomena such as inhalation-exhalation and spectral harmony (examples of the latter can be found in Air, 1991), or else on musical features such as arpeggiation, ostinato, glissandos and microtonal inflections; in the Violin Concerto no.1 these come together in a frenzy of activity. Occasionally, as in A Cradle Song (1993), the music has an almost Romantic fervour, while some of the later pieces (e.g. Going Up) are cast in a popular idiom, drawing more obviously on jazz and minimalism.

ADRIAN THOMAS

Kulesha, Gary (b Toronto, 22 Aug 1954). Canadian composer and conductor. He studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music, Toronto (graduated 1978), where his principal teachers included William Andrews and Samuel Dolin, and later with John McCabe (England, 1978–81) and John Corigliano (New York, 1982). He has held the posts of principal conductor of the Stratford Festival, Ontario (1983–5) and artistic director of the Canadian Contemporary Music Workshop (from 1987). He has also served as composer-in-residence with the Kitchener-Waterloo SO, Ontario (1988–92), and the Canadian Opera Company (1993–5), and as composer-advisor to the Toronto SO (from 1995). His teaching appointments include posts at Wilfrid Laurier University, Waterloo, the Royal Conservatory of Music and the University of Toronto, where he has directed the Contemporary Music Ensemble.

Kulesha's style synthesizes a wide range of influences. The sombre Mysterium coniunctionis (1980) is an allegory of the human psyche inspired by the writings of Carl Jung. Shaman Songs (1990), after Inuit texts, shows the influence of African drumming, breath and whisper sounds, Elliot Carter and Ligeti, as well as traditional choral writing. Minimalist ostinatos, a haunting slow movement, and a driving energy reminiscent of Shostakovich are featured in the Piano Trio (1991). The Gates of Time (1991) displays pointillistic and aleatory techniques, rhythmic vitality and a harmonic structure that can be considered almost Classical. The Recorder Concerto (1991) blends elements of Baroque concerto style with devises from Asian music. Among his most important works are the five Chamber Concertos.

DAVID PARSONS

Kulintang [gulintangan, klentangan, kolintang, kwintangan etc.]. GONG-CHIME of the Philippines, Indonesia and other parts of South-east Asia. The term is used also for an ensemble of gongs, drums and other percussion instruments in which the kulintang gong-chime is the main constituent. The origins of the kulintang are obscure, but its distribution and musical techniques link it with other ensembles in the area; the engkromong of Sarawak, for example, employs the same instruments and performance technique.

1. The kulintang gong-chime. 2. The kulintang ensemble. 3. Tuning and performing styles.

1. THE 'KULINTANG' GONG-CHIME. This consists of a number of bossed bronze gongs laid horizontally in a row in front of the performer, with the largest on the left and the smallest on the right, though sometimes this is reversed. The number of gongs varies: there are from seven to nine in Sabah and Brunei, usually eight among the Magindanao in the Philippines, six in Sumatra and up to 12 among some ethnic groups. The larger gongs measure about 22 cm in diameter, with turned-in rims 7 cm wide and bosses 3 cm high; the smaller gongs are approximately 18 cm in diameter, with rims 7 cm wide and bosses 2·5 cm high. They are manufactured by the lost-wax process. Some gongs are plain, with no designs, but the faces of others are etched with geometrical figures.

The gongs are laid on two parallel strings stretched out in a wooden frame. Some frames are very elaborate, especially among the Maranao people, where motifs with arabesque contours and rich colours (shades of blue, yellow and purple) display traditional craftsmanship in wood and brass sculptures. Simpler frames have no paintings or carvings. Among poorer families, who may not possess a frame, the gongs are sometimes placed on mats, clothes, leaves, sacks or some other surface which does not completely damp the sound. The gongs are played with two soft wooden mallets.

2. The 'kulintang' ensemble. The kulintang gong-chime is the melody instrument of the kulintang ensemble, the other instruments consisting of suspended gongs, drums and other percussion (see illustration). The suspended gongs vary in size, thickness and profile, with faces between about 30 and 60 cm in diameter and turned-in rims from about 10 to 20 cm wide. The gongs may weigh 5 kg or more. Outside the kulintang ensemble they are widely distributed in South-east Asia and used in various ensembles. The bigger instruments are more valuable than the kulintang itself, and are important as heirlooms, bridal gifts and a means of exchange. In performance they are suspended from a beam of a house or the branch of a tree and struck on their bosses with a rubber- or cloth-padded mallet to produce either long vibrations or short sounds damped by the player's left hand or right knee.

Table 1 shows the instrumentation of some kulintang ensembles as they exist among various cultural groups in insular South-east Asia. The melody instrument (Table 1, col.2) is supported by a drum (3) which provides a rhythm and the basic metre on which kulintang melodies depend. The other percussion timbres (4, 5) colour the rhythm and melody. The special timbres of one gong of the kulintang gong-chime (5) may supply a discreet metallic or rim sound, which in the case of groups D and F may be assisted by special ostinato techniques of the player. The suspended gongs are very varied in both type and musical function. Gongs with a plane face (6), usually played on the rim, provide the metallic sound which in some cases is produced by a gong of the kulintang (5). Other suspended gongs (7) produce muted sounds in counterpoint to each other, and may be played together with a long-sounding gong (9), as among the Sama (F) and the Tausug (1). The gandingan of the Magindanao (D8) is a special group of four gongs, graded in pitch and played by one musician; their long resonances overlay each other and lend a homogeneity to the whole orchestra.

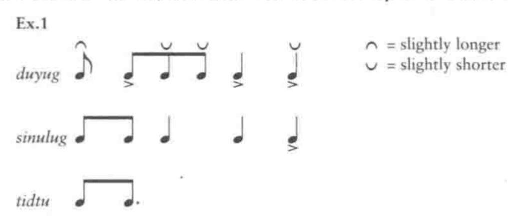
The ensemble of suspended gongs and varied percussion serves to accompany the kulintang melody, but it also has its own internal structure, different from that found in the Javanese GAMELAN.

3. TUNING AND PERFORMING STYLES. There is no standard tuning for kulintang, and almost as many scales exist as there are ensembles. There is a general tendency for an eight-gong kulintang to be tuned in narrow and wide steps similar to those of pelog and anhemitonic scales (see GAMELAN, §I, 6). However, these gaps have a wide range of measurements; in some old gong-chimes intervals measure less than 20 or even 10 cents, and are accepted by local performers only because there are no other gongs available. Moreover, the distribution of narrow and wide steps within the eight-gong row varies, thus changing the measurements of 5ths and octaves. The scale structure of several kulintang produced by a rural gong factory in Cotabato, Mindanao, is approximately C–D–F–F♯–G–A♯–B– (Maceda, 1988, p.9).



Kulintang ensembles are used for feasts, weddings, celebrations and entertainments. Whenever kulintang music is heard an audience usually gathers, listens and participates. In many cultural groups the kulintang players are women, but among the Iban they are usually men. Among the Magdinao of Datu Piang (Dulawan) young men have developed a virtuoso style initiated in the 1950s by Amal Lemuntod, a performer of considerable repute. Pieces take on the character of an informal contest between young players who try to outlast each other in rapid performances.

Two fundamental elements of kulintang music, as of other ensembles in South-east Asia, are the melody and the drone, or ostinato. In the kulintang ensemble the kulintang gong-chime provides the melody, and each of the punctuating instruments (Table 1, cols.3–9) contributes its own ostinato. This produces the unique variety of colours which characterizes kulintang music and sets it apart from that of other gong families.

Among the Yakan people kulintang melodies tend to be stationary; patterns played on a limited number of gongs are repeated at high speed with few note changes. Among the Sama people of Sulu melodic lines may be developmental, using many notes, as in the titik to-ongan, an independent instrumental piece or the tariray, which accompanies a dance performed, especially by elderly women, in ceremonies of possession. Some melodies are cellular, with short phrases repeated many times before changing to another melodic cell; an example is the titik tabawan, used at marriage ceremonies.

A characteristic Magindanao melodic form from the town of Datu Piang, Cotabato, consists of cells played by two, three or four gongs which change in number and pitch as they move up and down the eight-gong register. The musical interest lies in the permutation of the cells, the performer deciding on the combination of gongs, the length of time he will repeat it, when to add some and to suppress others, and when to transfer to another register or to a cell above or below. A closing pattern is a melodic rise and fall, ending on a middle note.

Magindanao kulintang music is clearly based on rhythmic modes. There appear to be similar structures in kulintang music of the Tuaran Dusun of north Borneo, but these are less apparent among the Taosug and absent among the Maranao, Yakan and Sama-Badjao. The three such modes (ex.1) are announced first by the drum and taken up by the other instruments. Two pieces of music are played in each mode to complete one musical rendition.

JOSÉ MACEDA

Kuljerić, Igor (b Šibenik, 1 Feb 1938). Croatian composer. He graduated from the Zagreb Academy of Music in 1965 after studying composition with Šulek, and in 1975–6 worked at the electronic music studio of RAI in Milan. He has subsequently held conducting posts in Zagreb and was in 1969 appointed a conductor of the Zagreb SO and the Choir of Radio-Television Zagreb.

Kuljerić is one of the most successful avant-garde Croatian composers. His music has evolved, in part, through continuos searching for new sound combinations and by relating an avant-garde expression to musical traditions; indeed, he has stated that continuity and change are the two constants of his work. He is also intrigued by the relationship between words and music. In some works, for example Žalobni pjev ('Mourning Song'), he creates polyphony from juxtaposed sequences of contrasted blocks of sound. In his works for the stage he uses a variety of new compositional and technical procedures to promote dramatic development. In his first opera, Moć vrline ('The Power of Virtue'), for example, the music consists of two layers (employed simultaneously or in alternation): one portrays the psychological world and realistic crowd scenes, while the other, based on deliberately trivial ideas, symbolizes alienation, manipulation and cynicism. In his second opera, Rikard III, the music is based on expressive, melodious vocal lines, while short tape interludes serve to comment on and connect each scene.

KORALJKA KOS

Kulka, Konstanty (Andrzej) (b Gdańsk, 5 March 1947). Polish violinist. He studied in Gdańsk with Stefan Herman (1960–65), and while still a student was a prizewinner in the Paganini Competition in Genoa (1964). Two years later he won first prize in the International Radio and TV Competition in Munich, and in 1967 he embarked upon a solo career, playing internationally with leading orchestras and conductors. He also performs a great deal of chamber music and regularly gives recitals with the pianist Jerzy Marchwinski. He has won a number of awards, made many recordings (including idiomatic readings of the Szymanowski violin concertos) and given several first performances, among them the Violin Concerto by Zygmunt Krauze (1980).

MARGARET CAMPBELL

Kullak. German family of musicians.

(1) Theodor Kullak (b Krotoschin [now Krotoszyn, Poland], 12 Sept 1818; d Berlin, 1 March 1882). Pianist and teacher. Encouraged by Prince Radziwiłł he gave his first piano concert before the Prussian king in Berlin at the age of 11. In 1837, while reading medicine in Berlin, he studied music under W.J.A. Agthe, E.E. Taubert and Siegfried Dehn. In 1843 he completed his musical education in Vienna under Czerny, Sechter and Nicolai; the following year he taught music to royalty and the aristocracy in Berlin and in 1846 was appointed pianist to the Prussian court. Together with Stern and Marx, he founded the conservatory (later known as the Stern Conservatory) in Berlin. He withdrew from the direction of this enterprise in 1855 (to be succeeded by Bülow) and founded the Neue Akademie der Tonkunst, which specialized in the training of pianists and soon became the largest private institute for musical education in Germany; towards the end of Kullak's life it numbered 100 teachers and 1100 pupils. His famous pupils included Hans Bischoff, Moritz Moszkowski and Xaver and Philipp Scharwenka. Among his vast number of piano compositions the most important are the studies; his Schule des Oktavenspiels is still considered indispensable. After Liszt, with whom he was on friendly terms, Kullak was one of the outstanding piano teachers of the 19th century.

(2) Adolph Kullak (b Meseritz [now Międzyrzecz, Poland], 23 Feb 1823; d Berlin, 25 Dec 1862). Music critic, brother of (1) Theodor Kullak. He studied philosophy in Berlin and, at the same time, studied music with A.B. Marx. Through Marx, he became co-editor of the Berliner Musikzeitung; he also taught at his brother Theodor's Neue Akademie der Tonkunst. His writings on music and piano method, Die Ästhetik des Klavierspiels (Berlin, 1861), are still of value.

(3) Franz Kullak (b Berlin, 12 April 1844; d Berlin, 9 Dec 1913). Piano teacher, son of (1) Theodor Kullak. He received his musical education at his father's Neue Akademie der Tonkunst and completed his studies in Paris under Wehle and Litolff. His career as a concert virtuoso was impeded by a nervous complaint, and he worked as a teacher at his father's academy, becoming its director after his father's death. In 1890 he was forced to close the academy for reasons of health; in 1891 he opened the Akademie für höheres Klavierspiel, but had to give it up in 1900, again on account of poor health. As a teacher, he was regarded as highly as his father. He made an important edition of Beethoven's piano concertos.

HORST LEUCHTMANN

Kullman, Charles (b New Haven, CT, 13 Jan 1903; d New Haven, 8 Feb 1983). American tenor. He studied at Yale University and the Juilliard School of Music. After making his début with the American Opera Company as Pinkerton in 1929 he went to Europe and sang the same role with the Kroll Oper in Berlin in 1931. He later appeared at the Berlin Staatsoper and Covent Garden, and in Vienna and Salzburg. He made his Metropolitan début in 1935 in Gounod's Faust. For 25 seasons he sang with the company while still making guest appearances elsewhere. Kullman was one of the most versatile tenors ever to sing with the Metropolitan. He was able to adapt his lyric voice to heavy roles, and his repertory ranged from Tamino and Rinuccio to Tannhäuser and Parsifal. He had an appealing vocal quality and a pleasing stage personality. He was also an admired concert singer and sang in the famous 25th anniversary performance in Vienna of Das Lied von der Erde under Walter in 1936. The recording of the occasion offers a fine souvenir of Kullman's voice and artistry.

ALAN BLYTH

Kulthum, Ibrahim Umm. See UMM KULTHUM.

Kultrún [cultrun]. A small conical KETTLEDRUM, 35 to 45 cm in diameter, used by the Mapuche (Araucanian) people of southern CHILE and parts of ARGENTINA. The shell, made of laurel or a large calabash, is covered with a hide from a goat, calf, sheep or horse. The hollow basin contains several small stones, seeds or coins that rattle when the instrument is struck with a drumstick or shaken. Wooden mallets covered in wool are used as drumsticks. In Argentina the kultrún is played by a female shaman who stands holding the drum on her left arm and strikes it with a drumstick, or sits with the drum on the ground before her, in which case she uses two drumsticks. Less commonly the instrument is shaken as an idiophone. In Chile the distribution of the kultrún encompasses four southern provinces: Bío-Bío, Malleco, Valdivia and especially Cautín. Among the Chilean Mapuche the kultrún is a principal instrument of the machi (shamans), frequently but not always female. It is used primarily in connection with healing rituals and for other shamanic ceremonies. The head of the instrument is painted in various forms and colours. See M.E. Grebe: 'El kultrún mapuche: un microcosmo simbólico', RMC, nos.123–4 (1973), 3–42.

JOHN M. SCHECHTER

Kumar, Aldo (b Ljubljana, 20 Oct 1954). Slovene composer. After taking degree in music education at Ljubljana University (1975), he continued to study composition, mostly as a self-taught practitioner. In the 1980s he attended composition courses led by Polish composers Bogusław Schäffer, Krzystof Meyer and Kotoński, and in 1995 he took a higher degree in music education. He has hitherto focussed primarily on vocal (especially choral) genres and on music for theatre and film. His musical idiom encompasses a variety of styles, ranging from folklike melodic expressiveness (as in his earlier choral works) and picturesque tone poems to the new simplicity of works such as Post Art or Look, Wolgang is Writing to You for piano and strings (1991).

Kumer, Zmaga (b Ribnica, 24 April 1924). Slovene musicologist. She studied Slovenian literature at the University of Ljubljana, graduating in 1948, and musicology at the Ljubljana Academy of Music, graduating in 1952. In 1955 she received the doctorate at Ljubljana University with a study of the Slovenian variants of the song Puer natus in Bethlehem. She was a member of the Institute of Ethnomusicology in Ljubljana (1949–89), and she taught ethnomusicology at the Academy of Music (1953–66) and the University of Ljubljana (1966–89). Most of her work has been concerned with the texts of Slovenian folksongs. She has studied the interrelationship of Slovenian folk music and the folk music cultures of the neighbouring Alpine regions, and has been able to demonstrate the existence of various common topics, texts and tunes, their migration and transformation. A prolific author, Kumer has established herself as a leading Slovenian authority on ethnomusicology of her generation.

Kumi-daiko [wadaiko, taiko] (Jap.: 'Ensemble of drums', from kumi: 'group', 'ensemble'; -daiko: the suffixing form of taiko, a generic term for Japanese drums). An ensemble using mainly indigenous Japanese percussion instruments for performance on the stage.

Japanese indigenous percussion traditionally served as an accompaniment in ritual music and classical theatre. Its post-war transition to centre-stage was mainly a result of the work of jazz drummer Oguchi Daihachi who, by featuring these instruments in a series of compositions exploring the interface between jazz and ritual drumming, brought them to the fore in contemporary composition. The performance of Oguchi's work at the 1964 Tokyo Olympics inspired the formation of similar ensembles nationwide, notably in the Hokuriku area where kumi-daiko performance became standard evening entertainment at hot springs.

During the 1960s Japan underwent a period of rapid modernization. Many felt the 'new' Japan to be losing touch with its 'traditional' culture, leading to renewed interest in such arts. As part of this interest Den Tagayasu began assembling a commune with friends for the pursuit of traditional arts and crafts on the remote Sado island. Among the many projects initiated was a kumi-daiko ensemble. Ondekoza ('devil drummers') specialized in performing stage arrangements of drum traditions drawn from the entire Japanese archipelago. Following its 1975 Paris début the ensemble enjoyed a number of international tours before an internal dispute caused the ensemble to disband.

Some members stayed on Sado, forming the ensemble Kodō in 1981 which (its name virtually synonymous with the genre) is widely regarded as Japan's leading kumi-daiko ensemble. It has been a pioneer in the expansion of kumi-daiko repertory, commissioning works from contemporary composers and incorporating performance arts from other cultures.

Japan is now home to more than 5000 kumi-daiko ensembles, many of which have evolved in proximity to pre-existing drumming traditions see JAPAN §VII, 4. The tendency of kumi-daiko to incorporate from the latter rhythms, performance style and, not infrequently, entire pieces has given rise to the issue of control and ownership of indigenous tradition.

Although kumi-daiko ensembles have been established in Germany, Britain, Australia and Brazil, the largest concentration of these groups outside Japan is found on the North American Pacific coast. Japanese ritual drumming was established in the region by the first influx of Japanese migrants in the early 1900s. In 1969 the first North American kumi-daiko ensemble formed in San Francisco, swiftly followed by rival traditions in San Jose and Los Angeles. In these early years ensembles strived to model performance on that of their Japanese counterparts. However, as the art form has matured, personal links with Japan have weakened, leading to stylistic divergence and culminating in the emergence of a distinct Californian tradition.

Kummer, Friedrich August (b Meiningen, 5 Aug 1797; d Dresden, 22 Aug 1879). German cellist and composer. He was the most important member of a musical family that flourished in Saxony in the 18th and 19th centuries. The son of Friedrich August Kummer (1770–1849), an oboist at the Meiningen and (from 1805) Dresden courts, he developed into a fine cellist under the supervision of Friedrich Dotzauer. Following the family tradition he also learnt the oboe, and joined the electoral court orchestra as an oboist in 1814; he did not play the cello in the orchestra until after the death of the cellist Karl W. Höckner. In 1852 he succeeded Dotzauer as principal cellist, a position he held until his retirement in 1864. Lacking the inclination to compete with cellists internationally, he remained in Saxony except for making a few concert tours in Italy and elsewhere in Germany. In addition to playing with the court orchestra, as principal cellist and as a soloist, he gave frequent chamber music concerts, notably with the younger Franz Schubert (1808–78) and Karol Lipiński (1790–1861). He was praised for his consistent strength and beauty of tone in every playing position. His 'truly classical serenity' provided a reliable support in ensemble playing. He taught the cello both at the Dresden Conservatory and privately, and, together with Dotzauer and Friedrich Grützmacher, was responsible for the high reputation of Dresden cellists in the 19th century; Bernhard Cossmann and Julius Goltermann were among his pupils. Kummer's grandson, Alexander Karl Kummer, was a pupil of Ferdinand David at the Leipzig Conservatory and a distinguished violinist in London.

Only about half of Kummer's 400 compositions were published, most of these before 1851. They fall into four principal categories: virtuoso compositions for solo cello and orchestra (written primarily for Kummer's own use); chamber music – nearly all using the cello – written to suit amateurs; elementary and intermediate studies for the cello; and some 200 entr'actes written for the Dresden court theatre. Of the solo cello works, only the Concertino en forme d'une scène chantante in D minor op.73, modelled after Spohr's 'vocal scene' violin concerto, kept a place in the repertory; most of these works are variations, fantasias and potpourris on popular songs and operatic melodies. Many of the cello studies, particularly the Violoncello-Schule op.60 (Leipzig, 1839), were still in use many years after Kummer's death.

Kumpán, Jan. See CAMPANUS, JAN.

Kün, Tobias. See KÜHN, TOBIAS.

Kuna, Milan (b Zdice, 19 March 1932). Czech musicologist. He studied musicology at Prague University, graduating in 1955 with a diploma dissertation on stylistic problems in the genesis of Dvořák's works. He took the *Kandidat*degree at the Institute of Musicology at the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences in 1964, with a dissertation on Czech musical life during the Nazi occupation; in 1969 he was given the doctorate for his dissertation on stylistic problems in the works of Dvořák. After serving as chief editor of the periodical Lidová tvořivost (1958–62) and its two successors, Melodie and Taneční listy (1963), he was appointed to the Musicology Institute of the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences in Prague (1964–). There he served as the editor of its new journal, Hudební věda (1964–9; 1991–). Although he retained his academy post during the post-Dubček 'normalization' in 1969, he was removed from the editorship of Hudební věda, and his publication activities were curtailed. However, he continued as an active music critic (for Hudební rozhledy, Kulturní tvorba) until this too was stopped in 1974. His chief interests as a musicologist have been Dvořák, the conductor Václav Talich, and the music of the Jewish ghetto Terezín and in the concentration camps. He has been responsible for many exhibition catalogues, mostly on these topics, and has edited several conference reports. A notable achievement is his general editorship of the monumental eight-volume edition of Dvořák's complete correspondence (1987–).

JOHN TYRRELL

Kunad, Rainer (b Chemnitz, 24 Oct 1936; d Reutlingen, 17 July 1995). German composer. He studied choral conducting at the Dresden Conservatory (1955–6) and composition with Fidelio F. Finke and Ottmar Gerster in Leipzig (from 1956). After teaching music theory and aural training at the Zwickau Conservatory, he was appointed music director at the Dresden Staatstheater (1960-74) and drama advisor to the Berlin Staatsoper (from 1971). He assumed the professorial chair of composition at the Weber Hochschule für Musik in Dresden in 1978. Increasingly disenchanted with socialism, Kunad moved to West Germany in 1984. The following decade proved one of his most productive creative periods. His honours included the Art Prize of the DDR (1972), membership in the DDR Academy of Arts (1974) and the National Prize of the DDR (1975).

Kunad aimed to compose comprehensible music with wide public appeal. Although influenced by Orff early in his career, he soon found a style of his own, employing a heterogeneous mix of materials and methods from dodecaphony and aleatory music to quotations and topical references. Characteristic is his combination of dramatic and architectonic approaches to structure; some works make use of arch forms or other symmetrical designs. The culmination of his instrumental writing is marked by a trilogy of concertos for keyboard instruments (1970–71) and the orchestral works Antiphonie (1971), Quadrophonie (1973) and Scène concertante (1973), in which he experimented with spatially separate instrumental groups.

Kunad's most successful work, the chamber opera Maître Pathelin (1968), which has received over 20 stage and radio productions, is notable for its playful approach to musical material, its cheerful tone and its quality of ironic distance. The operas Sabellicus (1972), on Goethe's Faust figure, and Vincent (1978), on Vincent Van Gogh, concentrate on fundamental problems of human existence represented in general philosophical and psychological terms. Although a number of his early oratorios are based on humanist works of the Enlightenment and the poetry of Johannes Bobrowski, later works, such as Salomonische Stimmen (1982), project a specifically Christian message. The symphonies from no.3 (1986–7) to no.16 (1994), with only two exceptions, employ biblical texts.

Kunanbayev, Abai (Ibrahim) (b Abayevsk, Semei [now Semipalatinsk], 22 Aug 1845; d Abayevsk, 5 June 1904). Kazakh poet, composer, philosopher and educator. He was born to the family of the leader of the Tobykty clan. His first teacher was Mullah Gabitkhan. From the age of ten Kunanbaev studied literature in Arabian, Persian and Chagatai, and in the third year of his education he began to learn Russian at school in Semei. He was a volostnoi from 1876 to 1878, volost being the smallest administrative division of tsarist Russia. During the 1870s and 80s he studied the works of A.S. Pushkin, V.G. Belinskii, A.I. Gertrsen, N.G. Chernïshevskii, M.E. Saltïkov-Shchedrin and N.A. Nekpasov as well as those of several European poets and scientists. By the age of 40 he was one of the most highly educated people in the steppe.

Kunanbayev lived during a period in which Kazakh traditional music flourished. His work drew together several musical-stylistic elements of Kazakh culture: aqyn recitations, traditional songs, Eastern philosophical poems and urban Russian sentimental songs ('romances'). He was an organizer and judge of musical-poetical contests in his village and a skilled dömbra player who composed kyui for this instrument. Between 1880 and 1897 he composed melodies for his own songs and his translations of poems. Only 25 of his melodies are known; the most famous include Segizayaq ('Octave') and Qor boldy zhanym ('My Spirit is Humiliated'). His song verses and his translations of poetry from other countries were highly popular among the Kazakhs and laid the foundations of an urban popular song style which emerged during the first half of the 20th century and became the Kazakh 'folk-pop' of the 1950s. The State Operatic Theatre, the State University and the State Pedagogical School were named after him, and the composers Akhmet Zhubanov and Latyf Khamidi and the librettist Mukhtar Auezov wrote an opera, Abai, in commemoration of the centenary of his birth.

ALMA KUNANBAYEVA

Kunc, Božidar (b Zagreb, 18 July 1903; d Detroit, 1 April 1964). Croatian composer and pianist. An accomplished pianist when still a boy, he studied the piano with Stančić and composition with Bersa at the Zagreb Academy of Music, graduating in 1925 and 1927 respectively. In the numerous recitals he gave he often performed works by Croatian composers and the French Impressionists. From 1929 he taught the piano at the Academy and directed the opera studio there from 1941. In 1951 he moved to New York, primarily to assist his sister, the celebrated soprano Zinka Milanov, in her career. Most of Kunc's compositions are for the piano, whether in strict sonata or concerto form, or as poetic programmatic miniatures; his style of writing for the instrument is masterly, employing a full range of texture, and differentiated, colouristic sounds. In later works his rich, post-Impressionistic harmony develops towards free atonality. His inclination for well-defined form and melody bears a certain resemblance to the style of Ravel, while his songs, mostly settings of Croatian and English texts, contain fine examples of flexible melodic and rhythmic writing. In a historical context Kunc cuts a rather isolated figure far removed from the aspirations of Croatian musical nationalism.

Kunc, Jan (b Doubravice, 27 March 1883; d Brno, 11 Sept 1976). Czech composer, teacher and administrator. He studied at the Czech Teachers' Institute in Brno and graduated from the Brno Organ School (where he had studied with Janáček) in 1903; his studies were completed in Prague under Novák (1905–6). He was a lecturer in composition and theory, and for many years director, at the Brno Conservatory (1923–45). Through his purposeful and determined work, he was able to raise the standard of the institution to a high level. His pupils included Tučapský and Zouhar. A music critic and publicist, he wrote the first biography of Janáček (in Pelclovy Rozhledy, xiv (1903–4), 491). As a composer he showed promise, though his administrative responsibilities left little time for creative work. His symphonic poem Píseň mládí ('Song of Youth') bears witness to his training in the late Romantic tradition; he was influenced by Dvořák and Novák (e.g. in the String Quartet) and partly by Janáček, although his cantata 70,000 was written in 1907, before Janáček's famous chorus on the same words. Kunc's finest achievements are the songs and choruses.

JAN TROJAN

Kundera, Ludvík (b Brno, 17 Aug 1891; d Brno, 12 May 1971). Czech musicologist, administrator and pianist. He took state examinations in singing and the piano in Vienna (1910) and later attended Cortot's materclasses in Paris (1925). He also studied Czech and German at Prague University and in 1925 took the doctorate at Brno University with a dissertation on the aesthetic aspects of musical reproduction. As a pianist he performed regularly at home and abroad and was professor of piano and aesthetics at the Brno Conservatory (1922–41) and after the war piano professor at the Brno Academy JAMU (1948–50). As a scholar Kundera's career is especially connected with Janáček. As a young man he wrote analyses of Janáček's style and introductions to new works. These include The Makropulos Affair and the Glagolitic Mass, for which he made the vocal scores. It was Kundera's account of the Glagolitic Mass, and his suggestion that the work arose from Janáček's becoming pious in his old age, which prompted one of Janáček's most famous and most indignant postcards. Kundera's later accounts of Janáček's Organ School and the Club of the Friends of Art (both 1948) and his comprehensive survey of Janáček's piano music (1953) retain their value for their first-hand knowledge. One of his last achievements was his posthumous volume, with Burghauser, of Janáček's piano music (F1, 1978) in the Complete Critical Edition.

A member of a cultured Brno family (his son is the novelist Milan Kundera) Kundera had administrative abilities and left-wing leanings which stood him in good stead during the post-war Communist administration. During World War I he fought in the Czech Legion in Russia and later wrote some of the earliest Czech accounts of music in the Soviet Union. With his long experience of the Brno Conservatory and the Brno Academy (which he helped found), he became a leading figure in Czech music education. He was director of the Brno Conservatory (1945–6), head of the music department of the Prague University Education Faculty (1946–8) and, until his retirement, rector of JAMU (1949–62).

JOHN TYRRELL

Kungsperger, Urbanus (fl 1435–45). German composer. He may possibly be identified with the Urbanus Konigsburg de Haynis who matriculated at Leipzig University in 1441. His three known works are found in the latest layer of D-Mbs Clm 14274. In all of them the discantus is presented an octave too low in relation to the tenor and contratenor, which in the Kyrie are themselves apparently notated at the wrong pitches. The Kyrie, which incorporates the trope 'Magne Deus potencie', and the hymn setting, Urbs beata Ierusalem, are in a simple, unpretentious style. The alternative text Sancte Dei preciose, in honour of St Stephen, written out in full after the hymn, perhaps indicates a connection with the collegiate church of St Stephan, Vienna. The Sanctus is more elaborate: it employs contrasting mensurations and migration of the Germanic chant on which it is based, and is characterized by restless syncopation.

WORKS

Kyrie magne Deus potencie, 3vv (discantus paraphrases Kyrie V), D-Mbs Clm 14274, f.133
Sanctus, 3vv (tenor based on Thannabaur no.35, with migration to discantus in central sections), D-Mbs Clm 14274, ff.130*v*–131
Urbs beata Ierusalem/Sancte Dei preciose, 3vv (discantus paraphrases Stäblein no.162/2 or Rajeczky no.100), D-Mbs Clm 14274, f.133*v*

IAN RUMBOLD

Künneke, Eduard (b Emmerich, 27 Jan 1885; d Berlin, 27 Oct 1953). German composer. In Berlin he attended university lectures on theory and was a composition pupil of Bruch at the Hochschule für Musik. In 1907 he was appointed chorus master at a Berlin operetta theatre, after which he was conductor for Max Reinhardt at the Deutsches Theater. During the war he played the horn in an infantry regiment, and afterwards went to the Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater. The success of Heinrich Berté's Schubert pastiche Das Dreimäderlhaus, which Künneke conducted, led him to operetta. In this field he enjoyed conspicuous international acclaim with Der Vetter aus Dingsda (1921), especially for the tenor solo 'Ich bin nur ein armer Wandergesell'. In the wake of this huge success, Künneke was engaged in 1924 and 1925 to compose works for the Shuberts in New York and one for the Gaiety Theatre in London. These achieved little notice, however, and his further recognition was confined largely to Germany, where he remained the leading exponent of operetta, writing some works in traditional style and others in a more modern dance idiom. Besides his theatre pieces, Künneke composed a string quartet, orchestral suites, two piano concertos and choral and vocal music. In later works he used jazz, most notably in his Tänzerische Suite (1929) written for radio.

ANDREW LAMB

Künspeck, Michael. See KEINSPECK, MICHAEL.

Kunst, Jaap [Jakob] (b Groningen, 12 Aug 1891; d Amsterdam, 7 Dec 1960). Dutch ethnomusicologist. Both his parents were professionally trained musicians; he began studying the violin at the age of four, and in his teens became interested in the folk culture of the Netherlands. He took a degree in law at Groningen (1917) and worked in banking and the law before joining a string trio (1919), which made a successful tour of the Dutch East Indies (now Indonesia). He subsequently remained in Bandung (Java) until the mid-1930s to study and collect the indigenous music (particularly that of the gamelan) while working for the government. In 1930 he was given an official, full-time appointment as musicologist for the Dutch government. He made long tours of the Indonesian archipelago during the next few years and, with the help of his wife Katy, established an archive of musical instruments, field recordings, books and photographs for the museum at Batavia (now Jakarta). His government post was abolished in 1934 and he returned to the Netherlands and lectured throughout Europe for the next two years. In 1936 he became curator of the Royal Tropical Institute in Amsterdam and began to amass what became one of the greatest collections in Europe. He began lecturing at the University of Amsterdam in 1953 and became a faculty member in 1958; he also made two lecture tours of the USA. In 1959 he succeeded Curt Sachs as honorary president of the Society for Ethnomusicology and Vaughan Williams as president of the IFMC. Shortly before his death he was elected to membership of the Anthropological Society of Vienna.

Kunst was a founder of modern ethnomusicology. In his study of Dutch folk music and various Indonesian musical cultures he showed deep concern for the humanity of man and for the need to comprehend music in the widest possible frame of reference – social, physical and spiritual. He himself coined the term ethnomusicology on the grounds that it was more accurate than 'comparative musicology' ('vergleichende Musikwissenschaft'). His many publications relating to Indonesia are standard reference works, without which Indonesians would have lost all knowledge of some of their most valued heritage; his collection of Dutch folk music is equally important.

MANTLE HOOD

Kunst, Jos (b Roermond, 3 Jan 1936; d Utrecht, 18 Jan 1996). Dutch composer, musicologist and poet. He studied Roman languages and literature before studying composition with Joep Straesser and Ton de Leeuw at the Amsterdam Conservatory. He was awarded the Composition Prize in 1970 and went on to study sonology at the University of Utrecht.

As a composer he was attracted by the extremist approach to sound and structure taken by composers such as Varèse, Webern and Xenakis. In pieces like Insecten (1966, awarded the AVRO prize at the Gaudeamus music week, 1967), Arboreal (1968, awarded first prize at the Gaudeamus music week, 1968) and Elements of Logic (1972, composed in collaboration with Vriend), Kunst, in pursuit of Xenakis, employed his knowledge of mathematical and logical theories. Underlying this approach was his conviction that complex music could be a tool to help the emancipation of the lower social classes. Partly because of the lack of social response to his austere and structural music, from musicians and audiences alike, he stopped composing between 1975 and 1989.

In 1976 he began teaching 20th-century music at the musicology department at the University of Utrecht. In 1978 he obtained the doctorate with a brilliant thesis Making Sense in Music: an Enquiry into the Formal Pragmatics of Art. A first attempt to formalize the process of aesthetic perception by the listener, the work made extensive use of mathematical formulae. Due to, again, lack of response, Kunst withdrew from teaching in 1989, after having formulated his ideas in a more colloquial style in Filosofie van de Muziekwetenschap (Leiden, 1988), and began to compose again. His music remained austere and non-tonal, but he also allowed repetition, tonal direction and warm sound colours (Concertino, 1994–5). His creativity and intelligence were always driven by the ambition to prove himself solely by quality and integrity. Never an accessible artist and scientist, he was a profound thinker whose influence has not as yet been accorded its full value.

Kunst- und Industrie-Comptoir [Bureau des Arts et d'Industrie; Contojo d'Arti e d'Industria]. Austrian firm of music publishers. It was founded in Vienna in 1801 by Josef Anton Kappeller, a Tyrolean painter, and Jakob Holer, who dealt mainly in fine art, maps and music. Because of illness Kappeller had to leave the firm on 12 March 1802; the artistic direction was transferred with the deed of partnership to the writer Joseph Schreyvogel (later secretary of the Hofburg theatre). Joseph Sonnleithner and Johann Sigmund Rizy invested in the enterprise as sleeping partners. The firm was known by its German title, as Bureau des Arts et d'Industrie and as Contojo d'Arti e d'Industria. From 1807 Schreyvogel directed it alone, and on 16 May that year he took over J. Leyrer's bookshop in Vacznergasse, Pesth (Hungary), which took the name of Schreyvogel & Co. in 1808; it was managed by Josef Riedl, 1808–12 and 1815–22, and by Sigmund Rabus, 1812–15. In 1811 Jakob Holer again became a partner in the Kunst- und Industrie-Comptoir, with Riedl.

Schreyvogel was not as effective in business as he was in artistic pursuits, and the enterprise became bankrupt (probably also partly because of Holer's unreliability) and was continued by Riedl, who was granted the concession on 18 March 1814. The firm in Vienna had closed by May 1823, and the music publishing rights passed over to S.A. Steiner & Co., who from 1826 brought out editions from the old plates but with new title-pages and the mark 'S.u.C.H'.

Schreyvogel published works by many well-known composers of the time including Beethoven (among them opp.53, 58–62), Albrechtsberger, Leonhard von Call, Eberl, Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, E.A. Förster, Mauro Giuliani, Gyrowetz, Hummel, Krommer, Nicolas von Krufft, Méhul, Mozart, J.P. Pixis, Domenico Scarlatti, Steibelt and Vanhal.

Kunz, Erich (b Vienna, 20 May 1909; d Vienna, 8 Sept 1995). Austrian bass-baritone. A pupil of Theo Lierhammer and Hans Duhan at the Vienna Music Academy, he made his début at Troppau in 1933. After various provincial engagements he became a member of the Vienna Staatsoper in 1940. In 1943 he first sang Beckmesser at Bayreuth, and he soon became a regular singer at Salzburg and other festivals. Covent Garden heard him as Leporello, Guglielmo and Figaro during the 1947 Vienna Staatsoper season; he sang Guglielmo with the Glyndebourne company at the Edinburgh Festival in 1948, and in 1950 he sang the same role at Glyndebourne, where he had been a member of the chorus in 1936. In 1953 he sang at the Metropolitan Opera for the first time.

An accomplished singing actor with a fine sense of humour and a gift for timing, he excelled in such roles as Papageno, Beckmesser and Figaro. For British tastes his Leporello was found too Austrian, not Italian enough, but with his endearing stage manner he was a firm favourite with Viennese audiences from the beginning, often playing small parts in operetta or Volksoper performances with consummate gusto and vocal skill. He was also an accomplished singer of popular Viennese songs, and recorded a considerable number. His many recordings of opera include Beckmesser, Papageno, Figaro, Leporello and Guglielmo.

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Kunz, Thomas Anton (b Prague, 21 Dec 1756; d Prague, *c*1830). Czech composer, pianist and inventor. He studied law and philosophy at Prague University and music with the Prague organist Joseph Prokop. Two of his Singspiels were performed in Prague: König Wenzel (1778) and Die Bezauberten (1779). The piano part of the cantata Pygmalion (1781) and some German songs (1807) were also published in Prague; the first edition of his German songs had appeared in Leipzig in 1799. Kunz was an exponent of the late 18th-century fad for designing combination instruments, constructing in 1791 a piano-organ which he called an Orchestrion (not to be confused with the mechanical instrument of the same name). Between 1796 and 1798, in collaboration with the Prague piano-makers Johann and Thomas Still, he made a second, improved model. Shaped like an over-size grand piano and housed in a mahogany case with sides of ornamentally carved frames backed with blue taffeta, the lower part comprised a two-manual positive organ of 65 keys (compass F′–a‴) with a 25-note pedal department (C–c″). It was said to have 21 stops and 360 pipes. To the left and above the pedal keyboard was a foot-pedal for operating the bellows. The upper part of the instrument was a straight-strung grand piano with the same compass and a total of 230 strings. Each instrument could be played together or separately as desired. Kunz descibed this instrument in his 'Beschreibung des Orchestrions', AMZ, i (1798), p.88. In 1799 he made improvements to the Bögenflügel (see SOSTENENTE PIANO, §1) made by Pieter Meyer of Amsterdam, introducing a less noisy bow-wheel mechanism.

ALEXANDR BUCHNER/ARTHUR W.J.G. ORD-HUME

Kunze, Stefan (b Athens, 10 Feb 1933; d Berne, 3 Aug 1992). German musicologist. Born to a Greek mother, he spent his childhood in Greece where his father ran excavations at Olympia. He began studying musicology with his godfather, Thrasybulos Georgiades, in 1952 at the universities of Munich and Heidelberg and took classical philology and Byzantine studies as subsidiary subjects. He also learnt the flute and conducting, the latter under Kurt Eichhorn. In 1961 he completed the doctorate in Munich with a study on the instrumental music of Giovanni Gabrieli; his Habilitationsschrift on 18th-century opera buffa was accepted in 1970. He took over the chair in musicology at the University of Berne in 1973, where he remained for the rest of his life.

Kunze was strongly influenced by his education in classical antiquity: Georgiades, his most important teacher, was convinced that the Viennese Classical style represented the pinnacle of achievement in the history of music through its direct link to the Greek antique world, and Georgiades' view explains Kunze's lifelong interest in Mozart (although Kunze managed to maintain greater intellectual independence than many of his mentor's students). Kunze's book on Mozart excels by virtue of its exploration of the poetic and dramatic traditions of the era and its historic breadth allows the author to evaluate composers such as Gazzaniga or Cherubini in a broad cultural context. In his writings on music after 1800, Kunze also distanced himself from the prevailing notion of an unbroken tradition of classical beauty; however, his deep understanding of the classical world gave him special insight into the problem of myth in Wagner's music dramas. Kunze played a significant role in opening up musicology to research in opera, and his brilliant exposition of classical traditions in recent music history has assured his recognition as one of the most important German-speaking musicologists of his generation.

ANSELM GERHARD

Kunzen [Kuntzen]. German family of musicians.

(1) Johann Paul Kunzen (b Leisnig, Saxony, 31 Aug 1696; d Lübeck, 20 March 1757). Organist and composer. His talent matured early, and according to his autobiographical sketch for Mattheson's Grundlage einer Ehren-Pforte he deputized for Leisnig's organist when only nine years old. He distinguished himself on the violin and on keyboard instruments while at school in Torgau (1705) and Freiberg, and from 1716 to 1718 was a student in Leipzig, where he was decisively influenced by Kuhnau and Telemann. His later polyphonic choral writing shows the effect of a rigorous training under Kuhnau, and an extant four-part organ fugue displays a thorough command of this style. A gifted singer and instrumentalist, he performed in both capacities at the opera, and stood in for the organist of the Nikolaikirche.

In 1718 Kunzen became a Kapellmeister in Zerbst and in 1719 he went to Wittenberg, where he founded a concert society. In 1723, after several concert tours, he took over the direction of the opera in Hamburg, where he performed a Passion and several operas of his own composition. When his two-year contract expired he remained in Hamburg as a private music teacher. During this period he journeyed to England with his son (2) Adolph Carl in 1728–9, there meeting Pepusch and Handel. On 26 September 1732 he was appointed organist and overseer of the Marienkirche, Lübeck. He was also active as a composer and conductor in Lübeck, providing numerous wedding arias and secular cantatas for merchants' festivities, instituting a subscription series and composing oratorio-like Abendmusiken annually for Advent. In 1747 he was admitted to Mizler's music society.

Kunzen's greatest achievement apparently lay in his Abendmusiken for Lübeck, which were reported by the Kantor Caspar Ruetz (1750) to have brought the genre to its zenith; Belsatzar of 1739 was singled out as a masterpiece by Scheibe (Critischer musicus) for its large double choruses. Unfortunately, as with much of Kuhnau's work, the music has not survived; the extant first part to the undated Der verlorene Sohn shows a thorough familiarity with Handel's works in the treatment of choruses, the portrayal of moods in arias and its fluent and adroit recitative, though without reaching a comparable command of melody. Especially noteworthy is Kunzen's effective use of string and wind instruments in support of choral polyphony.

(2) Adolph Carl Kunzen (b Wittenberg, 22 Sept 1720; d Lübeck, bur. 11 July 1781). Organist and composer, son of (1) Johann Paul Kunzen. He learnt the organ from his father and received training in Hamburg from J.W. Lustig. In 1728–9 he accompanied his father on a tour of England, and in 1744 he contributed two arias – his earliest known works – to his father's serenata for the Schonenfahrer Collegium. A year later he wrote a thoroughbass tutor (Unterricht im Generalbass mit Exempeln, 1745, in D-Bsb). The first volume of his collection Lieder zum unschuldigen Zeitvertreib appeared in Hamburg in 1748, and in 1749 he was appointed Konzertmeister at the court of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. He was made Kapellmeister there in 1752, but disputes with the court and the orchestra compelled him to resign a year later.

From 1754 to 1757 Kunzen lived mainly in London, where he probably wrote his 12 harpsichord sonatas, dedicated to the Prince of Wales and later published there as his op.1; the third part of his lieder collection also appeared in London at this time. He returned to Lübeck in 1757 as his father's successor at the Marienkirche, and continued his father's concert series and regular production of Abendmusiken. A stroke ended his career as a conductor, but with the aid of his pupil J.W.C. von Königslöw he continued to organize and plan the programmes for these series until his death.

Kunzen's work as a composer centred on the oratorio, beginning with an early six-part Passion oratorio for Schwerin with a colourful succession of scriptural texts, chorale stanzas, allegorical figures, recitatives and arias. Of his many annual Abendmusiken for Lübeck only two have survived; they distinguish Kunzen as a noteworthy proponent of accompanied recitative and of arias and duets with solo parts for virtuoso instrumentalists. His depiction of character and mood places him in the front rank of oratorio composers in his time; his choruses show Handel's influence, and in their design go beyond those of Telemann and Mattheson. Kunzen also wrote a number of occasional works; more important than these however are his lieder which, while modelled on those of Telemann, Mattheson, Görner and many others, are lyric or comic pieces of independent style notable for ease of melody and pleasing keyboard accompaniment.

(3) Friedrich Ludwig Aemilius Kunzen (b Lübeck, 4 Sept 1761; d Copenhagen, 28 Jan 1817). Composer, son of (2) Adolph Carl Kunzen. He received his earliest musical instruction from his father, who presented him in London in 1768 as a child prodigy. In 1781 he began studies in law at the University of Kiel. There he made the acquaintance of the noted author and dilettante C.F. Cramer, who encouraged him to devote himself entirely to music. Through Cramer he met J.A.P. Schulz, who gave him a recommendation to Copenhagen; there he was a successful keyboard performer, composer and organizer of concerts from 1784 to 1789. After the failure of his opera Holger Danske (31 March 1789) he moved to Berlin, where he founded a music shop with Reichardt and in 1791 edited the journal Musikalisches Wochenblatt. In 1792 he became Kapellmeister at the theatre in Frankfurt, where he performed his Singspiel Das Fest der Winzer, oder Die Weinlese in 1793. In 1794 he took up a similar post in Prague. He succeeded Schulz as royal Kapellmeister in Copenhagen in 1795, performing many of his own operas and Singspiele there and also directing the oratorio society Det Harmoniske Selskab.

As a composer Kunzen was particularly influenced by the style of his protector Schulz and, in his operas, by Mozart, whose works he often performed in Copenhagen. The lied collection Weisen und lyrische Gesänge (1788) uses the same folklike melody and uncomplicated form to express union with nature as characterize Schulz's songs. Artless melody with simple harmonization also distinguishes his Singspiel Das Fest der Winzer. The unsuccessful Holger Danske, which was composed to Wieland's proto-Romantic Oberon with Schulz as consultant adviser, mixes the styles of grand opera and Singspiel: simple strophic songs, situation comedy, tone-painting of nature, janissary music, energetic dance rhythms and dramatic scenas are all combined in the work, which recalls Gluck and Mozart. The large-scale oratorios Opstandelsen and Das Halleluja der Schöpfung, whose texts probably derive from Klopstock, are surprisingly effective in their succession of solos, duets and choruses, and in renderings of such natural phenomena as earthquakes (in the former) and sunrise (in the latter). The deft handling of the solo parts, powerfully conceived choruses and sensual orchestration point to Haydn's Creation, which Kunzen himself directed with large forces at Copenhagen in 1801. Kunzen presents a many-sided musical personality who was well versed in the music of his time, especially in Mozart's operas, and who, in his own stage works, cantatas and oratorios, produced much that is worthy of revival.

Kupfer, Harry (b Berlin, 12 Aug 1935). German director. After studying theatre science at the Hans Otto Theaterhochschule in Leipzig, he became an assistant at the Landestheater in Halle, where he made his début with Rusalka in 1958. He was then successively Oberspielleiter at the Theater der Werftstadt in Stralsund (1958–62), senior resident producer at the Städtische Theater in Karl-Marx-Stadt (now Chemnitz; 1962–6) and opera director of the Nationaltheater in Weimar (1966–72); from 1967 to 1972 he also taught at the Franz Liszt Musikhochschule in Weimar.

In 1971 Kupfer made his début at the Deutsche Staatsoper, Berlin, with Die Frau ohne Schatten, and the following year was appointed opera director and chief producer at the Staatsoper, Dresden. He remained at that post until 1981, winning wide renown for himself and the opera house. His adventurous programming there resulted in the premières of Udo Zimmermann's Levins Mühle (1973) and Der Schuhu und die fliegende Prinzessin (1976) and of Rainer Kunad's Vincent (1979), as well as challenging productions of such works as Moses und Aron (1975), Tristan (1975) and Simon Boccanegra (1980).

Kupfer came to international attention in 1978 with a Fliegender Holländer at Bayreuth that provided both an incisive psychological reassessment of Senta's predicament, in terms of socially induced alienation and neurosis, and an electrifying theatrical experience. In the same year he made his British début with a savage, sanguineous Elektra (WNO, 1978), returning with a highly praised Pelléas et Mélisande (ENO, 1981) and a characteristically polemical Fidelio (WNO, 1981). In 1981 he became chief producer at the Komische Oper, Berlin. Two of his many productions there were taken on the company's visit to Covent Garden in 1989: a Bartered Bride that penetrated behind the folksy façade to the underlying social realities, and an Orfeo ed Euridice that addressed the dilemma of the artist in society, relocating the myth against a bleak background of contemporary urban decline.

The two greatest avowed influences on Kupfer's dramaturgy were Felsenstein (though Kupfer was not his associate) and Brecht. The fusion of the former's principles of realistic music theatre, emphasizing the importance of motivation and immediacy in stage movement, with the latter's contrasting theory of 'alienation', resulted in a style both powerfully engaging and intellectually rigorous. Those qualities were strikingly evident in his most notable staging to date, that of the Ring at Bayreuth (1988): a densely allusive, socially critical exploration of the work that integrated mythological and contemporary planes so as to address the issues of accumulated wealth and power, ruination of the natural environment and global destruction while remaining faithful to the work's timeless universality. His second Ring was staged in Berlin (1994–6); other important productions have included Goldschmidt's Der gewaltige Hahnrei (1994) in Berlin and a sensational Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh at Bregenz (1995) that pointed up its contemporary relevance.

Kupfer collaborated with Penderecki on the libretto of Penderecki's Die schwarze Maske, first performed at the Salzburg Festival on 15 August 1986.

BARRY MILLINGTON

Kupferman, Meyer (b New York, 3 July 1926). American composer and clarinettist. He was educated at the High School of Music and Art, New York City, and at Queens College, CUNY, but is self-taught as a composer. In 1951 he joined the music faculty of Sarah Lawrence College, where he later became professor of composition and chamber music, retiring in 1994. He has received a composition prize and recording grant from the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters (1981), a Guggenheim Fellowship (1975), and many other awards, grants and commissions. A virtuoso clarinettist, Kupferman has given numerous concerts at Carnegie Recital Hall and elsewhere on the East Coast in which he has played many first performances of his own and others' music. He is a prolific composer whose output encompasses a variety of forms and styles. His aesthetic is demonstrated by his Cycle of Infinities, a group of over 30 chamber pieces which he began in 1961. The entire group, scored for a wide range of ensembles, is based on a single 12-note set and combines serial procedures, the popular appeal and rhythmic propulsion of jazz, and aleatory elements. Thus Infinities I is an entire concert for solo flute; Infinities 5 is a concert for solo cello, including pieces for cello and bass voice, cello and tape, and a concerto for cello and jazz band; and Infinities 6 is a cantata for unaccompanied chorus. Superflute (1972, commissioned by Samuel Baron) was the first of many works that Kupferman calls 'Gestalt forms'; these include works using mirror tape, polylingual cantatas, and new theatrical and improvisational forms. Among his major 'Gestalt' works are Celestial City, Angel Footprints and Fantasy Concerto (all 1973). An amateur painter, he has been inspired by visual artists in works such as Motherwell Fantasy and Images of Chagall. His dramatically effective film music ranges widely from the satirical German march in Goldstein to sentimental folksong-like material in Truman Capote's Trilogy. Kupferman has also composed scores for ballet and opera, and has arranged and orchestrated two musicals by Harold Rome. Symphony no.10 'FDR' (1981) was commissioned and given its première by Imre Palló and the Hudson Valley PO. He is the author of Atonal Jazz (Medfield, MA, 1992).

JEROME ROSEN/MICHAEL MECKNA

Kupka, Karel (b Rychvald, nr Karviná, Moravia, 19 June 1927; d Ostrava, 26 Oct 1985). Czech composer. He attended the Ostrava Institute of Music and Singing and after World War II studied privately with Kvapil and Petrželka. In 1948 he was appointed headmaster of the Karviná and Petřvald music schools. From 1951 until his death he worked at the Zdeněk Nejedlý State Theatre, Ostrava, first as répétiteur, then as assistant conductor and chorus master. Kupka began composing at the age of 17. His musical style was initially influenced by Janáček, Stravinsky and Bartók; later he developed a more personal idiom. In the late 1950s and early 60s his music met with critical acclaim, especially Picassiáda, which was awarded the Koussevitzky Foundation of New York prize (1963) and later made into a sucessful television ballet by Pavel Šmok. A terse vehemence and dramatic power are combined in his music with a lyrical melodiousness which has its roots in Moravian folksong.

OLDŘICH PUKL/KAREL STEINMETZ

Kupkovič, Ladislav (b Bratislava, 17 March 1936). Slovak composer, conductor and writer on music, active in Germany. In Bratislava he studied the violin at the conservatory (1950–55) and the violin and conducting at the Academy of Music (1955–61). After serving as conductor of the Hungarian Folk Ensemble of Bratislava (1959–60) and playing the violin in the Slovak PO (1960–63), Kupkovič worked as a freelance conductor and has composed music for film, TV and theatre. In 1963 he founded the Hudba Dneška ('Music of Today') ensemble, and in 1968 co-founded the New Music Days at Smolenice Castle near Bratislava. He emigrated to West Germany in 1969, living first as a guest of the Deutscher akademischer Austauschdienst in Berlin, and then from 1971 in Cologne. In 1973 he became a lecturer and in 1976 professor of composition at the Hanover Hochschule für Musik. Kupkovič came to prominence as a pioneer of 'experimental concerts', most remarkably Musikalische Ausstellung at the Akademie der Künste in Berlin (1970) and Klanginvasion auf Bonn (1971), a day-long musical battle which overran the entire city centre. He was also concerned with reforming orchestral playing and the role of the conductor, notably in Dioe (1968), which like many pieces of the period explores new methods of notation including text and graphics. Around this time he wrote a number of parodies of tonal music, such as the series K-Rhapsodie (1968–71). Later in the 1970s he rejected avant-garde music and atonality, advocating instead a return to compositions designed for the practical needs of the audience. Subsequent compositions have adhered to the language and models of classical tonality, but without the parodistic intent of his earlier music.

MORAG J. GRANT

Küpper, Leo (b Nidrum, 16 April 1935). Belgian composer. In 1962, after taking a degree in musicology at the University of Liège and the Université Libre of Brussels, he joined the APELAC studio (founded in 1958 by Pousseur), the first electronic music studio in Belgium, and began working for the musical sound-effects department of the RTBF. In 1967 he set up his own 'studio for experimentation and auditory electronic construction' in Brussels. He won the Prix Magistère of the Bourges international competition (1989) and became a member of the International Academy of Electro-Acoustic Music in Bourges. He was also awarded a prize for new forms of musical expression (1990) by the Société Belge des Auteurs, Compositeurs et Editeurs (SABAM).

As a pioneer of electronic music, Küpper has devised robots whose synthesized sounds are set off and stimulated by the human voice and the audience, or may be auto-stimulated, engendering a complex environment derived from a large number of sources (for instance, 350 audio channels at the Venice Biennale of 1987).

He was also the first musician in Belgium to become interested in the broadcasting of music in space by means of a sound dome, a metallic structure surrounding the audience with up to 104 loudspeakers mathematically distributed around it, allowing the angular perception of sound in space. Installations have included quarter-domes in the Galleria Nazionale d'Arte Moderna in Rome (1977) and the Chapel of the White Penitents in Avignon (1979), and half-domes at the Ars Electronica festival in Linz (1984) and at the Venice Biennale (1987). In 1987 he invented the kinephone, a keyboard instrument for spatialization through 50 channels.

Voice and language are at the centre of his output, 23 of the 34 works composed between 1967 and 1998 being devoted to that field. Küpper has conducted phonetic and vocal research using actors such as Jean-Claude Frison and singers such as Anna-Maria Kieffer, who translate their mental energy through their voices. Subsequently, the recording of these semi-improvised experiments acts as a reservoir of material for the electro-acoustic compositions that he calls 'électro-vocales'.

Kurath, Gertrude Prokosch (Tula) (b Chicago, 19 Aug 1903). American ethnomusicologist. She studied at Bryn Mawr College (BA 1922, MA in art history 1928), concurrently receiving training in music and dance in Berlin, Philadelphia, New York and Providence, Rhode Island (1922–8); she then attended the Yale School of Drama (1929–30). Later she was employed as a field research worker by the Wenner-Gren Foundation (1949–73), the American Philosophical Society (1951–65) and the National Museum of Canada (1962–5, 1969–70). Her main areas of interest have been ethnomusicology and dance ethnology, and she has made particularly substantial contributions to the study of Amerindian dance, and to dance theory and notation. She has also taught dance and has lectured on dance history. From 1958 to January 1972 she was dance editor for the journal Ethnomusicology. Her other scholarly interests include the fields of folk liturgy and rock music.

DORIS J. DYEN

Kurbanov, Tulkun (b Tashkent, 10 Oct 1936). Uzbek composer. He studied with Boris Nadezhdin at the Tashkent Conservatory (1956–61) where he took a postgraduate course with Boris Zeydman (1963–5). He then served as assistant to Boris Arapov at the Leningrad Conservatory (1968–9) before returning to teach at the Tashkent Conservatory (as professor since 1994) where his textbook on polyphony – written in Uzbek – is widely used. His works combine a symphonic approach to traditional (folk-professional) music with a keen interest in polyphony; he first attracted attention with his polyphonic treatment of Uzbek melodies. His music reflects a growing interest in traditional ritual, both secular and religious.

RAZIA SULTANOVA

Kurdikar, Moghubai (b Kurdi, Goa, 15 July 1904). Indian singer. Her earliest training was in dance, as she spent five or six years with the Parvatkar Natak Mandali touring drama company. Her musical training began after Alladiya Khan heard her practising a song for performance in a drama; although most male singers of the time refused to take female students, he offered to teach her. After some time, Moghubai moved to Bombay, where she studied with Bashir Ahmed Khan and Vilayat Hussain Khan of the Agra gharānā until Alladiya Khan moved there. It is unclear whether she studied other styles with his permission, but she received her most sustained training from him and as a teacher she was responsible for transmitting his style to the next generation. Her most famous disciples are her daughter Kishore Amonkar and V.H. Deshpande.

Moghubai's sense of rhythm was developed acutely by study with the dancer Ramlal Kathak and her early work with the tablā player Layabhaskar Karumama. She exploited the bol bāṭ form of improvisation, playing with text for rhythmic purposes. She was noted for her use of vibrato, letting it creep into sustained pitches or turning it into ornamentation. She introduced the practice of following the slow khayāl with a fast composition in a performance of khayāl by singers of the Alladiya Khan gharānā.

Moghubai Kurdikar received the President's Award for Hindustani Vocal Music from the Sangeet Natak Akademi in 1969.

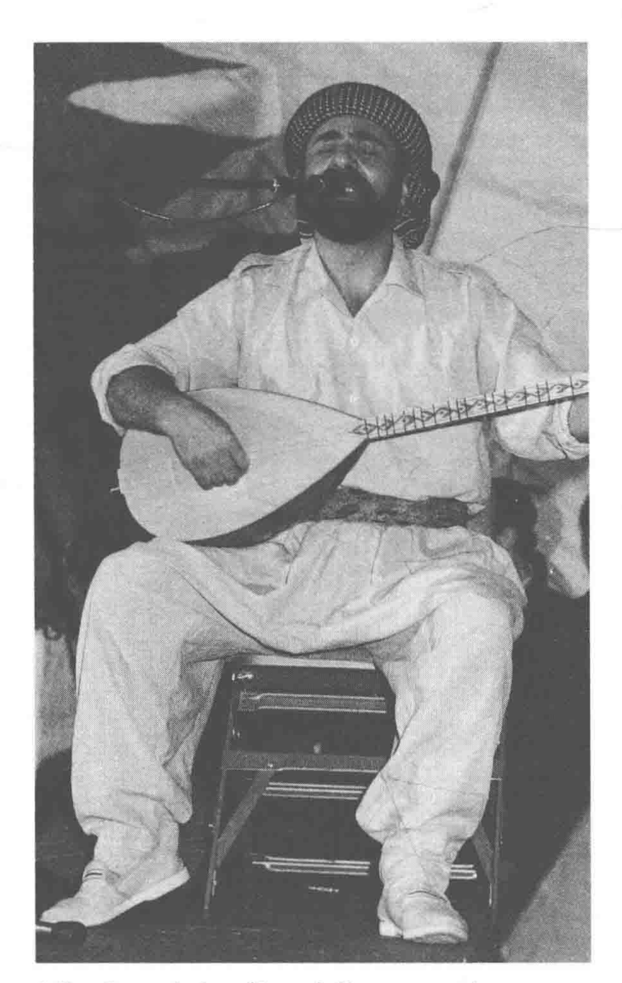
Kurdish music. Music of peoples inhabiting the Kurdish homeland (fig.1) and diasporic communities outside it.



1. Introduction. 2. Main secular musical forms, performances and performers: (i) Sung narratives (ii) Dances (iii) Ceremonial and work-songs. 3. Performance settings. 4. Religious music. 5. Musical instruments. 6. Modern developments.

1. INTRODUCTION. Most of the approximately 25 million people who identify themselves as Kurds inhabit a contiguous territory of some 320,000 km². In this area Kurds are a majority, and they call it Kurdistan ('land of the Kurds'). It extends from the eastern Pontus and Taurus mountains through the northern and central Zagros mountains to the Mesopotamian plain and is divided between the states of Turkey, Iraq, Iran, Syria, Armenia and Azerbaijan. In both Turkey and Iraq, Kurds constitute over 20% of the total population. The official names of most Kurdish cities and regions differ from their Kurdish names, e.g. Mahabad (Sawj Bulaq to Kurds). The major regions shown in fig.1 bear the names of Kurdish principalities that flourished between the 16th century and the mid-19th.

Outside the Kurdish homeland, there are substantial Kurdish populations in north-eastern Iran, central Anatolia, Istanbul and Ankara. Virtually the whole Jewish community of Kurdistan emigrated to Palestine, then to Israel between the mid-1920s and early 50s. In the second half of the 20th century a large Kurdish diaspora in Europe (and, to a lesser extent, North America) supported musical and other cultural activities. Recordings produced in Europe by Kurdish musicians find appreciative audiences in the homeland. The musical idioms now recognized as 'typically Kurdish' are those that have been most effectively diffused via recordings and the broadcasting media.

For most of recorded history, Kurdistan has been a region of great religious diversity. The pre-Islamic festival of Newroz (New Year, spring equinox) is celebrated with its attendant ceremonies and dancing, and it is a powerful symbol within diasporic communities. Since the 16th century most Kurds have been Sunni Muslims, following the Shafi'i school of jurisprudence; the Shi'a minority has been estimated at up to 7% of all Kurds. The Qadiri and Naqshbandi are the most important Sufi brotherhoods among Sunni Kurds. Three heterodox groups have developed distinct musical practices: the Alevi, Yezidi and Ahl-e Haqq (see §4 below). Judaism was a presence from at least the 2nd century CE until the founding of the state of Israel. Several medieval writers refer to 'Christian Kurds', and Kurdish adherents of the Church of the East and SYRIAN CHURCH MUSIC are still found in southern Turkey and western Iran. In eastern Anatolia the Christian influence of Armenian culture is still felt.

The two main dialect groups are Kurmanji and Sorani, which belong to the south-western branch of Iranian languages; they are divided by a linguistic boundary extending north-east along the Great Zab river. Although standard forms of Kurmanji and Sorani were developed in the 20th century, sung poetry often makes prominent use of local dialects. For example, Kurdish listeners quickly recognize songs in the Kurmanji dialect of Badinan (northern Iraq). Hewrami and the related language Zaza are central to the musical practices of the Ahl-e Haqq and Alevi, respectively. Speakers of Hewrami or Gurani regard it as a form of Kurdish; Western linguists usually classify Hewrami and Zaza among the north-western Iranian languages. Many Kurds are bilingual, speaking Turkish, Arabic, Persian, Armenian or neo-Aramaic in addition to Kurdish. Some songs in current repertories are contrafacta, which fit Kurdish lyrics to melodies borrowed from non-Kurdish sources.

Literary sources for the study of Kurdish music include historical chronicles such as the 16th-century Şeref-name of Bitlisi, the narratives of travellers such as Evliya Çelebi, sacred texts of the Ahl-e Haqq and other religious orders, manuscript collections of poetry intended for singing, and modern publications in Kurmanji and Sorani (some including musical notation). The first substantial efforts to notate and analyse Kurdish music were made by the Armenian composer, singer and scholar Komitas Vardapet (1869–1935). Ethnomusicological fieldwork has not been carried out in all regions, and the extent to which common musical features exist within the different Kurdish regions is somewhat unclear.

Many Kurdish musicians have gained widespread popularity SAYID 'ALI ASGHAR KURDISTANI and MIRYAM KHAN were prominent singers in the 1930s and 40s. MOHAMMAD MAMILI was a major figure whose death in 1999 was a significant political event. The KAMKARS, a family that performs as a group of singers and instrumental players, are very famous in Iran, Iraq and within the Western diaspora. ŞIVAN PERWER, a singer who accompanies himself on the bağlama (fig.2), has attained star status; he was the major Kurdish singer in Europe until other singers such as NASER RAZZAZI also became refugees.

2. MAIN SECULAR MUSICAL FORMS, PERFORMANCE AND PERFORMERS. While an abstract concept of 'music' equivalent to Western notions is alien to most Kurds, their thinking about performance and expressive behaviour is rich in categorizations and terminology. The following account deals primarily with Muslim Kurds living in the Hakkâri and Siirt provinces south of Lake Van in Turkey, but draws on Kurdish practices in western Iran and northern Iraq for comparison. Regional variance is greatest within forms and terminologies related to work and within ceremonial contexts such as wedding ritual. The broadest commonalities can be found in categories with narrative content, and in those connected with dancing.

(i) Sung narratives. The Kurds of western Hakkâri (south-eastern Turkey) distinguish three categories of sung narrative according to the prevailing content. Çîrok û stran ('legend or story with song') refers to the telling of usually fabulous stories in spoken prose, with songs for the main characters embedded in the tale. The songs are often metric and in rhymed verse; they may be of various kinds, e.g. dance-songs, lullabies or songs from the other two narrative categories (şer and evînî).

Şer ('battle, fight') designates the sung heroic narrative proper, where the subject is always a fight between men and the song uses poetic imagery to praise the human qualities and exceptional courage of the protagonists, who are known or believed to be historical figures. Other terms for this are lawje şere, xoşmêr, mêrxoş, mêrkanjî and beyt. These narratives are almost always named after their heroes. The story is usually widely known at least in general outline, and the performance of a heroic song is understood and judged as an interpretation rather than as the presentation of something new, although news of remarkable contemporary events may be spread through this medium.

A şer consists of a variable number of long strophes with roughly similar melodic and rhythmic outlines. Each strophe tends to begin with long-spun melismas and ends on long-drawn tones, both supported by vocables such as lêlê/lolo or phrases such as ax aman. In between, the account of the dramatic events is advanced in rapid parlando recitation. Many *ser*s employ a vocal range of an octave and a half or more, beginning each strophe near the upper limit and ending near the lower, but some heroic songs move narrowly within a 4th or 5th. Depending on the singer's skill, the presentation of a şer may take an hour or more.

Evînî (from evîn: 'love') are normally dramatic accounts of events that involve a tragic love relationship, which usually leads to violence and death, though there are also lyrical love songs. Their form and mode of presentation are very similar to those of the şer: strophic, with extended initial melismas followed by rapid, narrow-ranged, unmetred recitation and concluding long-held tones. Intermediate melismas may provide rests for the singer and listeners.

Narratives are always rendered by men whose skills are recognized or who strive for recognition. These skills include a fine, high-pitched but strong voice, an unfailing memory and the ability to interact with listeners and recreate and interpret stories that are generally known. However, in Hakkâri as elsewhere, a distinction is made between singers who expect material rewards for their services and those who do not accept any remuneration.

The professional bard, variously known as lavjebij, dengbij and beytbij ('sayer of songs/sounds/poetry'), follows a code of conduct that forbids him to sing or join in dance-songs without adequate reward. Lavjebij bards are found mainly east of the Great Zab river (in the eastern part of the former principality of Culamerg), and into north-western Iran. In the Iranian province of Kordestan, professional bards are known as beytbij (see IRAN, §III, 4(ii)).

Towards the west, in the area of the former principality of Badinan, musical professionalism is deemed unworthy of a 'free' tribal ('eşîr) Kurd, and storytelling and public epic-singing are left to the şa'ir poet and to roving lavjebij bards from the east. The şa'ir is a local man held in high esteem, but not paid. Itinerant dervishes also perform narratives, always accompanying themselves on the frame drum (fig.3). They have a repertory of their own, which includes epics and legends cast in rhyming verse, and classical forms such as qesîde (from the Arabic qaṣīda, ode). Narratives are also performed by the mitirp (from Arabic muṭrib: 'a singer'), professional musicians and craftsmen locally described as Gypsies or 'Turks'.

3. Dervish of the Naqshbandi order, with frame drum (def), singing a religious poem (qesîde) (Yekshawa, Kordestan, 1962)

The foregoing description applies primarily to the south-western province of Hakkâri and Siirt in Turkey, but it has close parallels in Kurdish western Iran, in particular around Mahabad (Sawj Bulaq), where a hierarchical system of landownership and patronage that existed before the 1979 Revolution had contributed to the development of Kurdish professionalism in music, reflected primarily in the narrative genres and in urban music practices. Similarly, in northern Iraq there flourished the singing and reciting of Kurdish poetry in several genres in addition to those discussed here (see IRAQ, §III, 3). Most of these share the general characteristics described for şer and evînî: they are strophic forms combining elaborate and wide-flung melismatic singing with the recitation of dramatic texts. Increasingly these genres are accompanied by long-necked lutes (bağlama or saz) and also non-Kurdish urban instruments such as the qānūn (zither) and 'ūd (short-necked lute), so that rural Kurdish epic singing is assimilating into a generalized West Asian urban style.

(ii) Dances. Throughout Kurdistan the ensemble of oboe (zurna) and double-headed cylindrical drum (dehol) is used to play for dances that involve a chain of dancers moving anticlockwise in a large circle. The instrumentalists are generally professional mitirps. Melodies are adaptations of regional or urban popular songs, and the dance movements are not specifically Kurdish but are of a generalized West Asian style.

In contrast, dance-songs (lawke govende, or simply govend) are sung in regional versions by Kurds of either sex, without instrumental accompaniment. The dancers form a single line, shoulder to shoulder, holding one another, often with arms crossed behind their backs (fig.4). Two types of dance-song may be distinguished. The antiphonal type, in which equal numbers of singers alternate, predominates in eastern Turkey and western Iran. The responsorial type is frequent in northern Iraq, along with the antiphonal, perhaps under urban influence.

Dance terminology applies to textual content (şer or evînî); to rhythmic patterns and steps (yekpêyî, dûpêyî, sêpêyî have 'one-', 'two-' and 'three-steps', respectively); to movements of the upper body (ya mila: 'with shoulder', or ya desta: 'with hand'), and to tempo (sivik, light and fast, or giran, heavy and slow). Dance types may also be named by association, e.g. swarkî ('horseman's dance') imitates the jumping of a horse, and şêxanî ('belonging to a sheikh'). In comparison with narrative songs, the texts of dance-songs are not considered to be important, yet some evoke noted events such as an aeroplane crash or images of the distant past such as the assembly (dîwan) of the princes of Culamerg who were vanquished in 1848.

Performances of antiphonal dance-songs employ either two single singers or two groups of two or three each. These may be all men or all women. The second singer or group repeats the melodic phrase and text line of the first who then proceeds to the next stanza on the same melody. The alternation of single singers is the prevailing practice east of the Great Zab river and in western Iran. The singers may vary their rendition in consecutive strophes, which may lead to polyphony when the strophes overlap. Individual strophes are short, their melodic range rarely exceeding a 5th. Strophic forms are highly regular and can be ordered into a small number of types. The structures of antiphonal dance-songs are very consistent throughout the Kurdish area, and they also correspond with those of other West Asian peoples (Turks, Arabs and Persians). What sets Kurdish dances apart are the language and the preferred high and tense vocal quality.

(iii) Ceremonial and work-songs. The alternation of singers also predominates in these genres. Weddings among the Ertoşi of western Hakkâri require that men and women sing at certain moments of the ritual. Women of the bride's family sing narînik before the departure of the procession that will take the bride to her husband. Serke zava ('over the groom') is a genre sung upon her arrival at the groom's house, when the couple first sits together. Thereafter şeşbendî are performed by men or women, or by two men and two women from the groom's family, in alternation. In all these cases, the singers stand still or sit, the performance is antiphonal and the traditional texts are sung syllabically on loosely metred melodies. In comparison with dance-songs, the tempos of ceremonial songs are much slower and the melodic ambitus tends to be wider. Where the voices of women and men alternate, they perform the same melody but on tonal centres a 4th or 5th apart.

Work songs include lullabies (narînik/lori, according to region) sung solo by women in short repetitive musical phrases to pacify infants, and solo butter-churning songs performed by women while shaking a bag of milk supported in a tripod. Men sing antiphonally while crushing wheat in a mortar to prepare bulgur; their songs have extremely short phrases whose duration matches a stroke with the mallet.

4. Men and women performing the govend dance (Hakkâri, 1958)

3. PERFORMANCE SETTINGS. In the second half of the 20th century, rural performance practices in Kurdistan focussed on the entertaining of guests by village and tribal elders, and on wedding celebrations. Guests were – and still are customarily entertained with the reciting, in prose and song, of narratives. If professional musicians (mitirp) are available (fig.5), they will undertake the task, often to the accompaniment of a spike fiddle (riçek). In eastern Kurdistan, a professional lavjebêj may be invited and remunerated with 'robes of honour', whereas in the west a local şa'ir may be called upon. Competitions of epic singers, who will alternately recite, vying for the applause of the listeners, add excitement to such occasions. The invoking of heroic deeds of the past, of the dignity of great men and the wonder-world of ancient myths and legends can instil both pride and tolerance. Competitions of epic singers representing parties in conflict have on occasion settled disputes (e.g. over pastures or rights-of-way for flocks) among nomadic tribes or within village settlements.

The major occasion for dancing and singing, however, is the wedding celebration. Professional musicians playing oboe and drum are hired to lead the dancing throughout the three or five days of the feast and to accompany the wedding procession. Men and women usually dance separately to their own singing, and the telling and singing of stories at night contribute to the festive mood of this occasion for sociality that brings the entire settlement or tribes of the bride and groom together.

5. Mitirp with spike fiddle (riçek) reciting a heroic song (şer) (Hakkari, 1958)

4. RELIGIOUS MUSIC. Some highly developed and unusual musical concepts and practices are found within certain of the Sufi brotherhoods and heterodox sects. For an account of music among the Alevi/Bektaşi followers, see ISLAMIC RELIGIOUS MUSIC, §III, 2(i).

The 60,000 to 70,000 members of the Yezidi sect are concentrated in the Mosul area of Iraq. Their doctrine includes ancient pagan, Zoroastrian, Jewish, Muslim and Christian elements. Music and dance form an essential part of their worship. Their official musicians, the qewwals ('those who speak'), are clergy of minor rank and form a guild said to number 50 men. These must take part in all religious festivals and in events in the life-cycle such as circumcision and burial ceremonies. The two principal occasions are the annual pilgrimage to the tomb of their prophet, Sheikh 'Adi, and their New Year. The musicians accompany the ceremonies with flute (ney or şebbabe) and frame drums (def), which are all considered sacred. They sing hymns and ecstatic songs, perform dances and fulfil other services. The koçek (dancers) serve in considerable numbers at the tomb of Sheikh 'Adi and as ministrants to the qewwals.

Members of the Ahl-e Haqq sect live mainly in southern Iran. Their doctrine has been influenced by ancient Mesopotamian and Iranian religions, as well as by Islamic mystical orders. They believe in cycles of incarnation and in theophany, i.e. manifestations of God and angels in human form throughout history. Through music, the worshippers can gain access to the mysteries of the sect, so that music constitutes a central part of their liturgy and spiritual life, and all the religious leaders are musicians. In the first theophany, the king of kings is said to have possessed 900 singers, 900 frame-drum players, 900 tembûr (long-necked lute) players and 900 blûr (flute) players. At present the tembûr is the only instrument used in the sect's ritual music, and it is venerated as a sacred object (for illustration, see IRAN, fig.14). The musician who plays it and sings the sacred texts is called kelam-xwan ('reciter'). The repertory has two main categories: the destgah and the hymns (qewl). The 12 destgah pieces have points in common with Persian art music. The hymns draw their melodies from sacred and secular sources. They are integrated in the liturgy, are performed responsorially by the recitant and the worshippers to the accompaniment of the tembûr, and are solemn and moderate in tempo.

5. MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS. Most of the instruments played by Kurds are shared with neighbouring ethnic groups. These include the frame drum (def, dayre, bendêr), goblet drum (dimbek), oblique rim-blown flute (blör, blûr, blîl, şimşal, şebbabe), duct flute (blûr, pîk, dûdik), whistle (pîk or fît fîte), double clarinet (dûzele or zimare; qoşme among the Kurds of north-eastern Iran) and cylindrical oboe (nerme ney, qirnate, balaban). The familiar duo of cylindrical drum and conical oboe (dehol û zurna or saz û dehol) is often played at Kurdish weddings by professional musicians who are not always Kurdish.

Spike fiddles (kemançe, riçek) are played in certain parts of Kurdistan and by many Kurdish musicians in north-eastern Iran. The long-necked plucked lutes of Kurds in Kurmanji-speaking areas are usually called saz, like those of the neighbouring Turks and Azeris; in north-eastern Iran Kurdish narrative song is accompanied by the dutar. The long-necked tembûr is the sacred instrument of the Ahl-e Haqq of southern Kurdistan; it has two strings tuned a 4th or a 5th apart, with the higher pitch doubled by a third string, and it accompanies the singing of sacred texts (kelam) in the spiritual assembly (Kurdish cem, Arabic jam'). The sacred instruments used in Yezidi ceremonies are the rim-blown flute şebbabe and the frame drum with jingles (def), both of which are themselves 'baptized' before being used in ceremonies of baptism and in other rites.

6. Modern developments. In the second half of the 20th century Kurds almost everywhere came under increasing pressure to hide or deny their Kurdish identity. Their music, language and distinctive dress have become arenas of conscious negotiation with dominant powers: police and military forces acting on government policies, especially in Turkey, Iraq and Iran, and immigration officials in the European diaspora, notably in Germany. Since the 1940s, radio transmissions have played an increasingly important role in bridging the gap between rural dwellers, cities across the Kurdish area and the wider world. In the 1950s villagers in the relatively secluded Turkish province of Hakkâri were listening to the state radio of Soviet Armenia, which transmitted regularly the recitation of Kurdish epics in Kurmanji by noted bards. In the 1990s cassette tapes with Kurdish titles featuring historical recordings of epic singers and urban Kurdish dance music were traded in Istanbul for the benefit of the large population of displaced rural Kurds in that city. Kurdish music and dance-songs play an important role within diaspora community celebrations.

Kurdistani, Sayid 'Ali Asghar (b Salawatawa, near Sanandaj [Sina], Iran, 1882; d 1937). Kurdish singer. He was born into a family of sayyids (descendants of the Prophet Muhammad) and was sent to a mosque school in Sanandaj to study the Qur'an and Islamic teachings. Already known for his voice as a child, his recitations of the Qur'an, mewlûdname (verses about the Prophet's birth) and munacat (prayers) attracted attention. His secular songs also gained increasing popularity. Through the patronage of an aristocratic family of Sanandaj, he travelled to Tehran, where he was received enthusiastically by the music community. In 1929 he recorded 17 Kurdish pieces for Polyphon. His 14 surviving performances include goranî (popular songs) and pieces identified as Persian dastgāhs such as Segāh and Dashtī. He was frequently invited to perform for thousands of listeners in many Kurdish towns, and his recorded songs also attracted crowds to tea-houses. His recordings were a permanent feature in the music programming of the Kurdish section of Radio Baghdad from the 1940s and in the Kurdish radio stations of Iran during the 1950s. His music has inspired Kurdish singers such as Aziz Shahrokh and the Kamkar ensemble. An account of his work is given in M.H. Baqî: Seyyid 'Elî Esxerî Kurdistanî (1998). The first CD of his music, Sayed Ali Asgar Kurdistani (1882–1936), Album No.1, was released in London in 1999.

Kurenkeyev, Murataaly (b Chon-Kemin, 1860; d Chon-Kemin, 1949). Kyrgyz instrumental performer. His grandfather Belek and his father Kurenkei (1826–1907) were well-known musicians, and Kurenkeyev learnt to play a number of traditional instruments including the kïyak (two-string fiddle), the komuz (three-string lute) and the choor (end-blown flute). In 1922 he organized the first ensemble of komuz players in the city of Przheval'sk. From 1930 to 1946 he worked in Frunze (now Bishkek), performing as a soloist and as a member of the orchestra of traditional instruments. He had an extensive knowledge of folklore, especially ceremonial genres, and his works included all the most important characteristics of the Kyrgyz melodic heritage. His repertory of traditional music comprised about 100 works, including shepherds' tunes, ritual koshok, instrumental miniatures and complex kyuu (programmatic instrumental pieces), and he was familiar with several komuz poems such as shyngrama, ker tolgoo and botoü. He also created his own kyuu, notably Kambarkan in honour of the hunter Kambar, the legendary inventor of the Kyrgyz komuz. Kurenkeyev used the kïyak to imitate the cries of animals, the sounds of nature and the patterns of human speech; it was said that 'his kïyak articulates words'. He was acquainted with the Kazakh aqyn and dömbra player Jambyl Jabayev. Kurenkeyev's work influenced that of several Kyrgyz composers, and his works have been used in operas, ballets and orchestral pieces.

Kuri-Aldana, Mario (b Tampico, Tamaulipas, 15 Aug 1931). Mexican composer. He studied the piano with del Castillo at the Academia Juan Sebastian Bach (1948–51) and composition with Vázquez, Tercero and Michaca at the Escuela Nacional de Música of the University of Mexico (1952–60), where he did research for a thesis, Concepto mexicano de nacionalismo (1963). At the Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes (INBA) he studied conducting with Markevich and Giardino (1957–8), and he had private composition lessons with Luis Herrera de la Fuente and Rodolfo Halffter (1961–2). A grant from the Di Tella Institute enabled him to pursue his composition studies there under Ginastera, Riccardo Malipiero, Messiaen, Maderna, Dallapiccola, Copland and Chase (1963–4), and in 1965 he had lessons from Stockhausen at the Mexico City Conservatory. He has held appointments as composition teacher at the Academia Juan Sebastian Bach, teacher of theory, harmony and counterpoint at the University of Mexico (1955–65), director of the Banda Sinfónica de la Secretaría de Educación Pública (1967–70), professor of music at the Academia de la Danza of the INBA, and honorary director of the Centro Libanés Chamber Orchestra (from 1971), which has commissioned and performed many of his works, including Formas de otros tiempos. In addition he has worked with enthusiasm in folk music research, being particularly interested in Spanish manuscripts as a primary source; he is a member of various folklore societies and has attended international conferences on the subject. In 1994 he was a founding member of the Consejo de la Música Popular Mexicana and in 1995 was awarded the Premio Nacional de Artes.

A traditionally orientated composer, Kuri-Aldana employs a folkloristic neo-classical style that may be traced to his teacher Halffter; but a broad and sure technique has allowed him to draw effectively on the styles of his diverse later teachers and of other composers. His versatility is shown by his ability to write songs and arrangements in an accessible manner (e.g. María de Jésus and Peregrina agraciada) as well as more sophisticated works, such as Los cuatro bacabs and Candelaria. The former resembles mariachi music in its insistent rhythmic formulae and characteristic parallel chords in 3rds to topical texts; Candelaria is a good deal more complicated, but never very adventurous in technique. Clarity and timbral contrast typify his mature works. His form tends to be non-linear, with added notes or rhythmic values enhancing the basically variation-type processes; such techniques, deployed in mosaic patterns, he learnt from Messiaen, and they have proved applicable to much Amerindian music in Mexico. The sparse textures, extreme ranges, continual rhythmic metamorphoses and harmonic dissonances (superimposed 4ths in octave displacements) of his work make for great fluidity. Kuri-Aldana has also composed popular pieces – such as Página blanca (bolero) or Mariposa en la noche (danzón) – which have earned him a prominent place within the popular music scene. In some of his works he has aimed to bring together both his popular and cultivated styles. His Danzón for orchestra and his Sinfonía bolero (both 1994) are two examples of this trend within his production. (S. Kahan: 'El compositor Kuri-Aldana', Carnet musical de X.E.L.A., Mexico City, 1963, 565–9)

GERALD R. BENJAMIN/RICARDO MIRANDA-PÉREZ

Kurka, Robert (Frank) (b Cicero, IL, 22 Dec 1921; d New York, 12 Dec 1957). American composer. He studied briefly with Luening and Milhaud but was principally self-taught. He was a faculty member at Queens College, CUNY, and, briefly, at Dartmouth College. He received a Guggenheim Fellowship (1951–2), an award from the National Institute of Arts and Letters (1952) and a Creative Arts Award from Brandeis University (1957).

Kurka is best known for his orchestral suite The Good Soldier Schweik (1956), which he later expanded into a two-act opera. Schweik is often compared with Weill's Kleine Dreigroschenmusik; not only are its instrumentation and tonal language similar, but both combine references to popular musical idioms (dances, marches, the ballad style) with pungent dissonances and brittle rhythms for ironic effect.

Neo-classical in style and influenced by the folk music of former Czechoslovakia (his parents' birthplace), Kurka's work is most particularly characterized by its use of repeated melodic and rhythmic motifs, the appearance of dissonant elements within a tonal structure and an energetic rhythmic drive (notably in the Symphony no.2 and the Serenade).

JAMES WIERZBICKI/R

Kurpiński, Karol Kazimierz (b Włoszakowice, Wielkopolska, 6 March 1785; d Warsaw, 18 Sept 1857). Polish composer and conductor. He studied with his father Marcin Kurpiński, an organist at Włoszakowice, and himself became organist at Sarnów nearby in 1797. In 1808 he took a post as tutor to the Rastawiecki family in Lwów, where he heard a number of Italian and German operas, and in 1810 he settled in Warsaw. There he met the dramatist Wojciech Bogusławski, known as the 'father of Polish theatre', through whose influence he was appointed deputy conductor at the National Theatre. In 1824 he was appointed principal conductor (on the dismissal of Józef Elsner) and in that capacity he presented a repertory of the highest quality, notably Mozart and Rossini, to Polish audiences. In addition to opera he regularly conducted orchestral concerts in the city; these included the first performances of Chopin's two piano concertos.

Kurpiński was also active as a teacher, establishing (1835) the School of Singing and Declamation at the National Theatre as a replacement for the conservatory, which had been closed down after the 1830 insurrection. He also founded and contributed regularly to the journal Tygodnik muzyczny ('Music Weekly'; later Tygodnik muzyczny i dramatyczny), the main forum for musical debate in Warsaw in the first half of the century. In 1823, just before his appointment as principal conductor at the National Theatre, he embarked on a European tour that took in all the major musical centres. Kurpiński's creative work slackened noticeably following the tour, and it seems possible that he felt his own music to be somewhat anachronistic in relation to the new musical styles of the 1820s. His later life was given over mainly to teaching, and by the time of his death he was largely forgotten.

Although he composed in many genres, Kurpiński's contribution was mainly to opera. He was the major Polish opera composer before Moniuszko, and his output (most of it composed for the National Theatre in Warsaw) was considerable. Many of his operas received only a few performances before disappearing from the repertory, but some had more lasting success, notably Szarlatan, czyli Wskrzeszenie umarłych ('The Charlatan, or The Raising of the Dead'), Jadwiga królowa Polska ('Jadwiga, Queen of Poland') and Zamek na Czorsztynie, cyli Bojomir i Wanda ('The Castle of Czorsztyn, or Bojomir and Wanda'). For the most part his stage works were vaudevilles or Singspiele, interleaving songs and choruses with spoken dialogue. Nine of Kurpiński's 26 known stage works survive complete, and there are extracts from a further eight. It is clear from the surviving works that the stylistic profile of his music was distinctly Italian, responsive both to such late 18th-century composers as Cimarosa and Paisiello and to such later masters as Rossini. At the same time Kurpiński laid some of the foundations of a national operatic style by drawing on themes from Polish history and folklore and making use of Polish national dances and folksongs. His most ambitious stage work was probably Jadwiga, a full-scale opera rather than a vaudeville, and similar in its broad design to the historical operas of Spontini. In the 1990s attempts were made to revive some of Kurpiński's operas in Poland, with notable success in the cases of Pałac Lucypera ('Lucifer's Palace'), Szarlatan and Zabobon.

Kurpiński also composed choral music, some of it to rousing nationalist texts by such contemporary Polish writers as Ludwik Osiński and Kazimierz Brodziński, and some to traditional liturgical texts (there are six masses, including a Requiem). In addition he wrote numerous solo songs, mainly for amateurs and characteristically in the manner of strophic dance-songs, far removed stylistically from the Romantic art song. They include Michał Korybut, one of the best of the collection of 'historical songs' (1816), with texts by Niemcewicz and musical settings by Franciszek Lessel, M.A. Szymanowska, Elsner and others. These took on a considerable significance in the context of an emergent nationalist ideology in Polish art and letters.

Less distinguished musically are the orchestral and chamber works (the former are mainly ballet scores), and a large collection of piano pieces. Most of these are in the salon manner typical of early 19th-century Polish composers, favouring genres such as variations, potpourris, fantasies and, above all, polonaises.

Kurrende (from Lat. currere: 'to run', or corradere: 'to scrape together', 'to beg'). A term in use from the 16th century onwards for itinerant boys' choirs trained in the Lateinschulen in Germany. The choir members, lacking financial support, begged alms from the townsfolk by singing in the streets and squares or from house to house; in addition, their services were engaged occasionally for special functions such as weddings and funerals. The custom is still current in Germany. (MGG1; F. Krautwurst [includes extensive bibliography])

Kurt(-Deri), Melanie (b Vienna, 8 Jan 1880; d New York, 11 March 1941). Austrian soprano. She studied in Vienna with Fannie Müller and in 1902 made her début at Lübeck as Elisabeth. After a season in Leipzig she withdrew for further study with Lilli and Marie Lehmann in Berlin. She joined the Hoftheater, Brunswick, in 1905 and was engaged at Berlin (1908–15). She sang at Covent Garden in 1910 as Sieglinde and Brünnhilde (Die Walküre) and in 1914 as Kundry. From 1915 to 1917 she sang at the Metropolitan Opera, making her début as Isolde and singing, as well as the Wagner repertory, the title role in Iphigénie en Tauride, Leonore (Fidelio), Pamina, Santuzza and the Marschallin. In 1920 she joined the Berlin Volksoper, where she sang until 1925. She possessed a rich, powerful dramatic soprano voice, evinced in her recordings of Wagner, and had outstanding dramatic presence. HAROLD ROSENTHAL/R

Kurtág, György (b Lugoj, Romania, 19 Feb 1926). Hungarian composer and pianist. He is the only composer to have lived through Hungary's communist regime (1949–89) and still to have achieved international recognition. Drawing on Bartók, Webern and, to a lesser extent, Stravinsky, his work is characterized by compression in scale and forces, and by a particular immediacy of expression.

1. 1926–57. 2. 1957–72. 3. 1973–84. 4. From 1985.

1. 1926–57. Kurtág was born to Hungarian parents (his birthplace was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire until it was ceded to Romania in 1918). He spoke Hungarian at home and, from the age of six, Romanian at school. His mother began teaching him the piano when he was five; although he then abandoned it for some years, from 1940 he studied the piano with Magda Kardos and composition with Max Eisikovits in Timişoara. He moved to Budapest in 1946, acquiring Hungarian citizenship in 1948. There he continued to study the piano with Pál Kadosa, chamber music with Leó Weiner and composition with Sándor Veress (1946–8), briefly with Pál Járdányi and then with Ferenc Farkas (1948–55) at the Franz Liszt Academy of Music. He graduated in piano and chamber music in 1951 and in composition in 1955. He was awarded the Erkel Prize by the Hungarian state in 1954 and 1956, and later in 1969. In 1947 he married the pianist Márta Kinsker (b 1928); their son György was born in 1954.

During this early period Kurtág was more active as a pianist than as a composer, his performances of Bartók being particularly praised. His most significant early composition, the Viola Concerto which was his diploma piece, was considerably influenced by Bartók's Violin Concerto no.2: Kurtág had been profoundly moved by Menuhin's Budapest performance in 1946. Kurtág's works of this period demonstrate a loyalty to Bartók's rhythmic structures and folksong-influenced sonorities above all else.

Access to music from the West was limited at that time: only a few scores of Stravinsky, Schoenberg and Webern were known to Kurtág. There were barely any performances of such works in Hungary, but Kurtág's friend and fellow-student György Ligeti had a limited collection of recordings, including some Stravinsky. All Bartók's works were to be heard in concert, apart from 1949 to 1953 when certain of his middle-period compositions were banned by the Communist party. The few pieces Kurtág wrote to fulfil commissions for socialist-realist works were later withdrawn.

2. 1957–72. Kurtág spent a year (1957–8) studying in Paris, attending the classes of Messiaen, Milhaud and Max Deutsch. It is the parallel consultations with the art psychologist Marianne Stein, however, that he cites as being of most importance. When Kurtág presented her the sole work he completed in Paris, an extensive piano piece, Stein's advice was that his compositional voice would be most effectively developed if he set himself simple musical tasks, such as exploring the various ways of connecting two notes. Such clearly defined limits emerge as structural mechanisms throughout opp.1–9, a coherent group of short works written almost exclusively for small forces. A particularly clear example of the taut structures is found in the Eight Piano Pieces op.3, first performed in Darmstadt in 1960 by Andor Losonczy. The first of the highly characterized pieces involves an ostinato in the bass constructed from varied pairings of B, C and D that are set into opposition with fragmentary, wide-ranging, gestural figures in the treble. These move chromatically towards C♯, which is rhythmically and insistently repeated until the bass ostinato falls silent. The C♯ is the end: it is the missing link between B, C and D and thus the 'goal' of the piece.

Paris provided an opportunity for Kurtág to encounter new scores. His study and copying out of all the principal works of Webern made a lasting impression. His String Quartet op.1 shares features of Webern's opp.5 and 9. All six movements typify his newly discovered concentration of expression, the principle of 'completing' the 12-note space is used frequently, and the work opens with an allusion to Webern (the first four notes of op.28). The third and fifth movements use a 12-note row; although Kurtág experimented with dodecaphonic procedures during this period, a row is usually little more than the starting-point for a movement. The frequent use of ostinato may also be cited as coming from Webern, or even from Stravinsky, but the technique is equally Bartókian. The debt to Bartók, in particular to his middle-period quartets, is evident in Kurtág's op.1 in the arch-like pairings of movements 1 with 6 and 2 with 5; juxtaposing of highly contrasted articulation such as glissando, pizzicato and tremolo; boldly characterized rhythmic impulses; and violent fragmentation of cells of notes. The note row used in the third movement even begins with the fugue subject of Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta. When the quartet was first performed in Budapest in 1961, it caused a sensation as the first Hungarian work to demonstrate assimilation of modern Western musical currents.

Bornemisza Péter mondásai ('The Sayings of Péter Bornemisza', 1963–8) op.7, a 40-minute song cycle for soprano and piano which was Kurtág's first vocal work since before 1956, crowned this first mature compositional phase and also broke away from the period's relentlessly cogent concision. 24 movements are distributed unevenly between four parts entitled 'Confession', 'Sin', 'Death' and 'Spring': this large-scale four-part symphonic structure is unparalleled in Kurtág's output. Extracts from the sermons of the 16th-century reform preacher Bornemisza are arranged to evoke this journey through life and death to rebirth. The four-part division was defined by Kurtág's music rather than Bornemisza's texts, but Kurtág responded to the sense of the frequently lurid prose with extravagantly volatile vocal writing and a virtuoso piano part, reaching extremes of musical expressionism. The work's madrigalian evocation of the text is a reference to Schütz's Kleine geistliche Konzerte, and Kurtág's sensitivity in setting the Hungarian language is unsurpassed.

The decision to remain in Hungary after the revolution in 1956 was of inestimable significance to Kurtág's subsequent professional activities and the wider dissemination of his works. From 1958 to 1963 he worked as a répétiteur at the Bartók Music School (a secondary school specializing in music); in 1967 he was made a professor of piano at the Liszt Academy, changing to professor of chamber music about two years later. Between 1960 and 1968 he also worked as a répétiteur of soloists with the Hungarian state concert agency, the National Philharmonia. His reputation as an instrumental and vocal coach preceded his success as a composer at home and abroad. The Sayings of Péter Bornemisza made no impact on Darmstadt at its world première there in 1968, and for the next five years Kurtág was unable to make significant progress, despite a year of study in West Berlin (1971) undertaken with support from the Deutscher akademischer Austauschdienst.

3. 1973–84. When the piano teacher Marianne Teöke invited Kurtág to contribute some pieces to an album of works for children in 1973 and he responded with Elő-Játékok ('Pre-Games'), the task of writing simple pieces for a specific type of player shifted him out of his impasse. Another stimulus was the experimental New Music Studio (Új Zenei Stúdió), formed in Budapest in 1970 by the conductor Albert Simon (b 1926), the musicologist András Wilheim and the composers Gyula Csapó, Barnabás Dukay, Zoltán Jeney, László Sáry, Zsolt Serei and László Vidovszky. In workshops and concerts, the group presented Hungarian premières of works by such composers as Stockhausen, Cage, Wolff, Feldman, Kagel and Reich, and composed new works to explore innovatory, improvisatory interactions between playing and composing.

So important did Kurtág's new-found form of piano writing become that since his first commission such pieces, called Játékok ('Games'), have formed a constant backcloth to all his compositional activity. They were intended to offer children a liberating approach both to making music and to the piano itself, but evolved into a liberating activity for the composer too. The graphic notation employed is intended to stimulate the performer (adult or child) to experiment with sound and sensation rather than to analyse the score intellectually and, according to the performance instructions, to revive the spontaneity of such practices as 'free declamation, folk music parlando-rubato [and] Gregorian chant'. Some pieces are referred to as Duchampian objets trouvés: one plays a 'game' with glissando (Perpetuum mobile (object trouvé)), another with all the Cs on the keyboard (Prelude and Waltz in C). Games was also a method of filtering the musical ideas of others, sometimes in homages, at other times less respectfully. Kurtág even experimented with the individual styles of members of the New Music Studio, hence Hommage à Jeney (Phone Numbers of our Loved Ones 1), and Hommage à Vidovszky (Phone Numbers of our Loved Ones 2). He also found himself able to work through events in his life by treating Games pieces as a musical diary, with the result that many titles reflect the death of friends and colleagues.

Kurtág's new beginning in Games reworked musical ideas from op.7 and also became a compositional workshop and pool of material for later works. The pieces he completed between 1975 and 1979, of which Hommage à Mihály András (12 Microludes for String Quartet) op.13 and József Attila-töredékek ('Attila József Fragments') op.20 for solo soprano represent particularly successful examples, are characterized by the wittiness of Games and a structure of epigrammatic, self-contained, bagatelle-like movements. Four Songs to Poems by János Pilinszky op.11 has absorbed the almost primitive rawness, the 'open', 'unfinished' quality of Games. Op.13 was commissioned by the Witten Festival and performed there by the Éder Quartet in 1978; its subtitle 'Microludes' is an invention of Kurtág's, referring to the anchoring of 12 movements by reference to one of the notes of the scale, which rise in chromatic sequence.

This period was one of increased collaboration with particular performers, including the pianist Zoltán Kocsis, the violinist András Keller and the soprano Adrienne Csengery, who gave the premières of all seven of Kurtág's cycles for soprano from op.12 to op.26. Of these, Poslaniya pokoynoy R.V. Trusovoy ('Messages of the Late R.V. Troussova') op.17 was his most substantial work since op.7, and its success triggered the wider dissemination of Kurtág's music outside Hungary. It was commissioned by the French state and the Ensemble InterContemporain; the latter, with Csengery, gave the première in Paris in 1981, conducted by Sylvain Cambreling. The cycle bears superficial resemblances to Schoenberg's Pierrot lunaire: 21 highly charged songs for soprano are accompanied by varying combinations of instruments. The grouping of the movements into three sections, 'Solitude', 'Somewhat Erotic' and 'Bitter Experience – Sweetness and Chagrin', recalls Kurtág's practice in op.7, but the sustaining allegorical framework has been replaced by the fragmentary narration of a love affair. The prominent use of cimbalom, celesta, piano, harp, mandolin and extensive percussion is also typical of Kurtág, as is the aphoristic nature of the movements. Longer poems are sustained by erratic ostinatos, the 'nervy' quality of which is present throughout. Kurtág's response to the explicitly confessional poems was remarkably empathetic, and he continued his evocative word-setting. A new lyricism and further refined textures transcend his consistently chromatic harmonies to make op.17 his most immediately communicative large-scale work written up to this point.

Op.17, which, like two songs in op.16 and the whole of opp.19 and 26, set the work of Rimma Dalos, was the second of five vocal works in Russian. Not only this Russian poet was to fascinate Kurtág: having failed to learn the language when it was forced upon him, he studied it in order to read Dostoyevsky in the original. Russian became 'sacred' for him in the way that Latin was for Stravinsky, and it led to a burst of creativity. Omaggio a Luigi Nono op.16, first performed in London in 1981 by the BBC Singers under John Poole, demonstrates his interest in the sounds in themselves in its opening song, which simply declines the Russian pronoun 'whose': the text reads 'Chey, chyu, chyo, chiy . . .'. Kurtág's other major choral work, Pesni unïniya i pechali ('Songs of Despair and Sorrow') op.18, presents poems by Lermontov, Blok, Yesenin, Mandel'stam, Akhmatova and Tsvetayeva. His choral writing is characterized by dense clusters and complex textures; all the works are exceptionally difficult to perform.

4. FROM 1985. Kurtág composes painstakingly and haltingly: in 1985, when he was 59, his output had reached only op.23, and several works remained unfinished or had been withdrawn for revision. He had made an almost unparalleled contribution to performance, however, both in and outside Hungary. He never taught composition, but his coaching of instrumentalists at the International Musicians' Seminar in Prussia Cove, Cornwall, and the International Bartók Seminar in Hungary brought him widespread fame. Zoltán Kocsis, András Schiff and the first Takács String Quartet are among his pupils. Despite having decided to give up performing when he lived in Paris, he was drawn back to it through devising a concert programme of his own transcriptions of Bach and Games for two and four hands, for himself and his wife. This new concert activity, combined with his teaching, generated increasing international interest from 1985 onwards; at this time he also began to compose more steadily. Seven international awards punctuated his continuously growing recognition and activity outside Hungary, culminating in the Ernst von Siemens Music Prize in 1998. Kurtág officially retired from the Liszt Academy in 1986, teaching only a limited number of classes there until leaving Hungary in 1993. Since 1993 he has lived in Berlin (in residence with the Berlin PO, 1993–5, and as a member of the Akademie der Künste, 1998–9), Vienna (as composer-in-residence at the Wiener Konzerthaus, 1995–6), Amsterdam (as honorary professor at the Royal Conservatory of the Hague, 1996–7) and Paris, working in collaboration with the Ensemble InterContemporain and at the Conservatoire (1999–).

The first new venture in this fruitful period was the spatial distribution of groups of instruments. Four works employ this principle, which is indebted as much to antiphonal choirs of the Renaissance and Baroque (and personal experience of hearing music) as to such 20th-century works as Stockhausen's Gruppen. In both . . . quasi una fantasia . . . op. 27 no. 1 and Op. 27 No. 2 (Double Concerto) the piano plays a major role (joined by a cello in the latter) and is placed centre-stage. Other groups of instruments, including an intricate ensemble of percussion, with tam-tam and bongos, are positioned around the hall in both works. In Grabstein für Stephan op.15*c* a guitar provides the central focus, and in the unique Samuel Beckett: What is the Word op.30*b* the 'soloist' is an alto recitation. Kurtág's interest in certain performers is already evident from 'marcatissimo di Kocsis', a performance instruction in . . . quasi una fantasia . . .. The soloist in Samuel Beckett: What is the Word, however, actually re-enacts the process of learning to speak that the actor Ildikó Monyók went through after a road accident which struck her dumb. The performance rights of the vocal part have been assigned to Monyók for as long as she wishes to perform the work. She stutters through Beckett's last prose text, with a commentary from groups of voices and instruments from all around the concert hall: the work evidently provides a metaphor for the struggle to communicate and to create, with which Kurtág himself has battled throughout his artistic career.

This new experimentation with larger ensembles, coupled with a request from Claudio Abbado and the Berlin PO in 1993, finally drew Kurtág back to the symphony orchestra, for which he had not completed a piece since his student Viola Concerto. Stele op.33 received its première by the Berlin PO under Abbado in Berlin in 1994. Although intricate control of textures in massive Romantic forces is new in Kurtág's output, the actual materials used in Stele are reworkings of earlier pieces. This recycling technique is already apparent in both parts of op.27 and earlier. In the case of Stele, the central Lamentoso of the three-movement work is an expanded variation of the 14th song of Stsenï iz romana ('Scenes from a Novel') op.19 and the final Molto sostenuto takes an earlier Games piece as a harmonic framework and enriches it with softly vibrating reiterations.

Such synthesis in large-scale forces and forms is, however, still exceptional. Kurtág's most recent phase is characterized by loosely structured groups of fragments, signs of which were apparent earlier. The work that opened the newly productive phase in 1985 was Kafka-Fragmente op.24, comprising 40 miniature movements for soprano and violin (without any chromatic 'microlude' progression). It was the longest grouping of aphoristic pieces into a defined 'whole' at that point. Hölderlin-Gesänge op.35 consists of a large collection of vocal fragments, from which the performers may make a selection in a chosen order. Kurtág regards the piece as a 'work in progress' from the point of view of his own input too: he may add further fragments, rearrange fragments for instruments or provide them with accompaniments. . . . pas à pas – nulle part . . . op.36 is of the same genre, although with a defined order. Kurtág may add a theatrical dimension at some stage, which might resolve his lifelong (unrealized) desire to write an opera. The chosen writing of Hölderlin and Beckett is particularly suitable for Kurtág's bagatelle-like composition, though not the reason for its existence. Jelek, játékok és üzenetek ('Signs, Games and Messages'), for varying combinations of string instruments, has evolved in the same way, as has Üzenetek ('Messages') op.34 for orchestra. These late works present a paring down of Kurtág's style to its barest gestural, speech-like core, demonstrating a reductive progression mirrored in the ever-accumulating collection of Games for piano and in the as yet ungrouped pieces for wind instruments.

RACHEL BECKLES WILLSON

Kurth, Ernst (b Vienna, 1 June 1886; d Berne, 2 Aug 1946). Swiss musicologist of Austrian birth. He studied music history at Vienna University under Adler and privately with Robert Gund and in 1908 took the doctorate with a dissertation on Gluck's early operas up to Orfeo. After a short spell as conductor, he taught for a time at the Freie Schulgemeinde at Wickersdorf. In 1912 Kurth completed his Habilitation at Berne University with a dissertation on the theory of harmony. He was appointed reader in 1920 and from 1927 until his death held the chair of musicology. He was also the founder and editor of the Berner Veröffentlichungen zur Musikforschung.

Kurth was a creative thinker as well as an inspiring teacher who was able to impart to his students his deeply intuitive and dynamic approach to music. He published a number of works of the greatest importance, both to musicology and philosophy. His Grundlagen des linearen Kontrapunkts (1917), in which he examined the linear and motoric aspects of melody, made his international reputation: the book had an enormous influence not only on Bach research but on the teaching of counterpoint and composition. It was followed by Romantische Harmonik (1920), a work which is both a harmony textbook for advanced students and a guide to the philosophical aspects of Romantic harmony. Kurth regarded chords as 'reflexes of the unconscious', and he distinguished two polarized 'constructive' and 'destructive' forces in Romantic harmony; for him the first chord in Tristan was a symbol of the Romantic attitude of mind.

Kurth's most extensive work was that on Bruckner (1925), where in addition to providing an acute biographical study he developed his theory of musical form, which he believed was not a static pattern but a creative process. His findings are summarized in Musikpsychologie (1931), where, as opposed to the 'psychology of sound', music and sound are regarded as proceeding from the composer's being and not from outside. This philosophical basis of Kurth's thought stems from Schopenhauer's conception of music as the manifestation of a will that created both the world and its culture; and it was on this and on Freud's theory of the subconscious mind that Kurth founded the central idea of all his work – that of psychic energy.

KURT VON FISCHER

Kurtz, Edmund (b St Petersburg, 29 Dec 1908). Australian cellist of Russian birth. He studied with Klengel in Leipzig (1922–5) and Leo Weiner in Budapest (1925–6). After making débuts in Rome (1924) and Berlin (1925) he was principal cellist of the Bremen Opera orchestra (1926–7), personal cellist to Anna Pavlova from 1927 to 1930, and a member of the Spivakovsky Trio (1932–5). He was principal cellist of the Prague German Opera orchestra under Szell (1932–6) and the Chicago SO (1936–44), after which he followed an international solo career. A 1945 performance of Dvořák's Cello Concerto with the NBC SO conducted by Toscanini was recorded live and remains the Italian conductor's only recording of that work. Compositions dedicated to Kurtz include Ernst Krenek's Suite for solo cello, op.84 and Milhaud's Concerto no.2, of which he gave the première with Rodzinski and the New York PO in 1946. Of his many recordings, Prokofiev's Sonata, op.119, with Artur Balsam, is outstanding and was also the first of that work. His playing is distinguished by an impeccable technique, innate musicality and a rich tone. Of his numerous editions of cello works the most significant is that of the Bach Suites, based faithfully on the Anna Magdalena manuscript which appears in facsimile opposite each page. Kurtz has owned two Stradivaris, the 'Suggia' (1717) and the 'Hausmann' (1724), and two Tourte bows which belonged to Romberg.

MARGARET CAMPBELL

Kurtz, Efrem (b St Petersburg, 7 Nov 1900; d London, 27 June 1995). American conductor of Russian birth. He studied with Nikolay Tcherepnin and Glazunov at the St Petersburg Conservatory; he then went to Riga University and the Stern Conservatory, Berlin. He made his début at Berlin in 1921, deputizing for Nikisch at a dance programme given by Isadora Duncan. He became musical director of the Stuttgart Philharmonic, 1924–33, and also toured with Anna Pavlova in Europe, Australia and South America during the three years before her death in 1931; he made his first visit to Britain at that time. He spent eight years (1933–41) as musical director of the Ballets Russes de Monte Carlo (successor to the Diaghilev company), touring widely in Europe and the USA. During the 1940s he worked in films, both in cinematic versions of Ballets Russes productions and feature films such as Escape Me Never (music by Walton, 1947) and Orson Welles's Macbeth (music by Ibert, 1948).

After settling in the USA, where he took American nationality in 1944, Kurtz became musical director of the Kansas City PO (1943–7) and the Houston SO (1948–54), improving the standards and prestige of both orchestras. He was joint music director (with John Pritchard) of the Liverpool PO, 1955–7. From 1957 he was a freelance conductor, giving concerts in Leningrad and Moscow in 1966 (his first return since 1919), and with operatic engagements at Rome and Milan. His repertory was wide, though he specialized in Russian music, and he directed performances of colourful yet sensitive vitality. Besides stylish recordings of classic ballet scores, and works by Rimsky-Korsakov and Tchaikovsky, his discs include the first symphonies of both Prokofiev and Shostakovich and four orchestral miniatures by Lyadov. He was married to the flautist Elaine Shaffer.

NOËL GOODWIN

Kürtzinger. See KÜRZINGER family.

Kur'yan, Wladzimir Mitrafanovich (b Minsk, 25 March 1954). Belarusian composer. He attended Minsk Music School where he studied the bayan; later, he graduated as an external student of the Belarusian Pedagogical Institute (1981), from Dzmitri Smol'sky's composition class at the National Conservatory (1984) and then completed his training there as an assistant lecturer (1986). He began working as head of the music section of the Yanka Kupala Memorial Theatre in 1984. His distinctively lyrical works mostly employ Belarusian folk instruments (such as the cimbalom, bayan, dömbra and violin) in novel timbre combinations and in transparently fluid textures. Impressionistic, shimmering strata freely coalesce into sketchlike scenes, although in large scale works (Cimbalom Concerto and the symphonic poems) dramatic themes are employed in conjunction with classical structures. The contemplative and illusory atmosphere of his works is the result of an essentially Romantic aesthetic.

TAISIYA SHCHERBAKOVA

Kurylewicz, Andrzej (b Lwów, 24 Nov 1932). Polish composer, pianist and conductor. At the State Higher School of Music in Kraków (1951–4) he studied composition with Wiechowicz and the piano with Sztompka. A jazz pioneer in post-Stalinist Poland, he was pianist with the group MM 176 (1954) and founder-leader of the Polish Radio Organ Sextet (1955–62). He was conductor of the Polish Radio and Television Orchestra in Warsaw (1964–6) and in 1969 founded the Contemporary Music Formation with the explicit intention of bringing jazz and contemporary music together. In 1967 he became host in a famous artistic cellar in Warsaw together with his wife, the jazz singer Wanda Warska. Among his awards is the Italia Prize (1981). Kurylewicz has made a substantative contribution to Polish music, especially in film and jazz. While not espousing the extremes of the avant-garde, he nevertheless combines extended instrumental techniques with Romantic neo-classicism. The string quartets and trio Dormitina (1986) are deeply introspective as well as vigorously rhythmic; in other works, such as Impromptu avec romarin (1992), his playfulness and jazz experience are brought to the fore.

ADRIAN THOMAS

Kurz, Ivan (b Prague, 29 Nov 1947). Czech composer. He took lessons with Risinger and attended the Prague Academy of Musical Arts, where his teachers included Hlobil (1960–71) and Dobiáš (1973–6). His compositions have taken prizes in various competitions. Although most of his work is for the concert hall, he enjoys writing for television, film and theatre. Inspiration for his work is drawn from a range of literary, naturalistic and artistic sources. Until 1979 his work was based on motivic development, a trim concordant system and clearly defined formal divisions. Nakloněná rovina ('Slanting Plane') introduced a new emphasis on simplicity and a minimum of expressive elements without thereby reducing the spectrum of the work's message. Typical is the great sense of plasticity and strong contrast, a dynamic factor in many of his works' free forms.

IVO MEDEK

Kurz [Kurtz, Kurz-Bernardon, Bernardon], (Johann) Joseph Felix von (b Vienna, 22 Feb 1717; d Vienna, 3 Feb 1784). Austrian comic actor, singer, dramatist and theatre manager. The son of the actor-manager Felix Kurz, and godson of 'Hanswurst' Stranitzky and J.B. Hilverding, he grew up in the theatre, and by the age of 20 he was performing leading roles with the German troupe at Vienna's Kärntnertortheater under the direction of Stranitzky's successor, Gottfried Prehauser. From 1740 until 1744 Kurz performed in Germany (most notably in Frankfurt and Dresden). Back in Vienna (1744–53) he developed and perfected the kind of magic burlesque, generously larded with songs, choruses, ensembles and incidental music, that dominated the popular repertory in most of the southern German lands. In a lengthy series of plays, mainly of his own devising, he appeared as Bernardon, a lively, urbane, satirical comic character. After the imperial ban on extemporization, Kurz moved in 1753 to Prague, where he was Locatelli's sub-lessee and director at the Kotzen Opera. He returned to Vienna in 1754, earning notoriety for his lavish spectacles and lasting renown for the high standard of the music offered in his company's performances (Haydn was Kurz's collaborator in Der (neue) krumme Teufel; earlier Ignaz Holzbauer had written a score for a comedy by Weiskern, 1746). Kurz was in Prague again in autumn 1760, and subsequently he appeared at Venice and Pressburg (now Bratislava) and in a number of German cities. During 1769–71 Kurz was in Vienna again, as co-lessee with Gluck; his productions included La serva padrona and a revival of Der krumme Teufel. In 1771 Kurz toured via Breslau and Danzig to Warsaw, where he directed the theatre and, after his retirement, ran a paper factory. Count Karl Zinzendorf noted his presence among the audience at the Burgtheater on 9 October 1783.

In 1743 Kurz married Franziska Toscani and in 1758, three years after her death, he married Teres(in)a Morelli. Both his wives and his numerous children were members of his troupe; Teresa especially was an important artist in her own right, being chosen in 1770 to create the role of Amore in Gluck's Paride ed Elena. Kurz himself was a versatile singer; in one of his own comic operas he sang the three principal parts (falsetto, tenor and bass). He was also brilliantly successful as a comic actor. If his extemporizations offended both Maria Theresa and Joseph von Sonnenfels (the principal figure in the Viennese Enlightenment), they continued to refer to him quite frequently. As a theatre impresario Kurz did not ignore the growing demand for regular plays and serious operas, but he is best remembered as an inventive comic dramatist and actor, with a full and remarkably early appreciation of the role of music in the theatre; he may indeed be said to have introduced the first works that can be recognized as modern Singspiele.

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Kurz, Selma (b Biala, Silesia, 15 Oct 1874; d Vienna, 10 May 1933). Austrian soprano. Although she made her début in Hamburg as Mignon in 1895, her first appearance at Vienna in the same role in 1899 established that city as the centre of her artistic and private life. She was highly successful in many and varied roles, including Tosca and even Sieglinde, but became particularly famous in the coloratura repertory, notably as Verdi's Gilda and Oscar. Gifted with a voice of remarkable purity, sweetness and ease, she also possessed a shake of amazing perfection and duration, which she was accustomed to display – not inappropriately – in an inserted cadenza to Oscar's teasing 'Saper vorreste'. Between 1904 and 1907, and again in 1924, she dazzled Covent Garden audiences in these and other parts. In 1916 she became the first Zerbinetta in the revised version of Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos in Vienna, where she continued to sing until 1926. Among her many successful recordings are the unaccompanied 'Lockruf' from 'Goldmark's Königin von Saba and numerous versions of her cheval de bataille, 'Saper vorreste'.

DESMOND SHAWE-TAYLOR

Kurz, Siegfried (b Dresden, 18 July 1930). German conductor and composer. At the Dresden Hochschule für Musik (1945–50) he studied composition with Finke, conducting with Hintze and the trumpet with Seifert. He was music director of the Dresden Staatstheater (1949–61) and then conductor of the Dresden Staatsoper, of which he became Generalmusikdirektor in 1971. He was appointed a professor in 1979. Awards made to him include the National Prize of the GDR (1976). Both as a conductor and composer he displays precision and virtuosity; his music retains a spontaneity of feeling despite its accomplished technique. His Trumpet Concerto, rhythmically lively in its use of jazz ideas, won great popularity. Kurz makes unorthodox use of 12-note procedure, particularly in his symphonies.

Kürzinger [Kürtzinger, Kirzinger, Kyrzinger, Khierzinger]. German family of musicians and composers. They were active in Bavaria in the 17th and 18th centuries.

(1) Johann Kürzinger (b Geisenfeld, nr Ingolstadt, fl 1620–30). Composer. He was the organist at St Nikola in Passau in about 1624. His known works are Lesbij modi . . . Liber primus . . . ab organo (Passau, 1624) for one to four voices, and a four-voice motet, Benedicite omnia opera Domini in Victorinus's Philomela coelestis sive . . . cantiones sacrae (Munich, 1624).

(2) Ignaz Franz Xaver Kürzinger (b Rosenheim, Upper Bavaria, 30 Jan 1724; d Würzburg, 12 Aug 1797). Instrumentalist and composer. He was the son of J. Anton Kürzinger, principal town musician in Rosenheim. He was sent to a seminary in Innsbruck to prepare for the priesthood, but he left in 1740 to become a trumpeter in a Hungarian cuirassier regiment. During the First Silesian War he was taken prisoner and brought to Berlin, where C.H. Graun took an interest in his musical abilities and gave him composition lessons. After Kürzinger's release from prison, he travelled to Bonn, meeting the Elector of Cologne, Clemens August, who took him on a journey to Italy and subsequently made him a grand master of the Teutonic Order. In the order's chapel in Mergentheim, Württemberg, he performed many musical duties, and in 1751 he was appointed Kapellmeister. He remained in Mergentheim until 1763 when he joined the court orchestra of the prince-bishop at Würzburg as a violinist. Shortly thereafter he became the music director of the orphanage at the Julius spital, where his students included Georg Joseph Vogler. He is known to have composed a school drama with music, Fides et Perfidia, an oratorio, Der sterbende Heiland, a large amount of church music, violin and guitar pieces, and secular vocal music, most of which was lost in World War II. The only works known to be extant are a Missa solemnis in D (1794; D-EB), a cantata Wut und Liebe (autograph keyboard score, Bsb), and David et Apollo . . . sive VIII Symphoniae solemniores, op.1, for orchestra (Augsburg, 1750). Of more than passing interest is his manual Getreuer Unterricht zum Singen mit Manieren, und die Violin zu spielen (Augsburg, 1763, 5/1821), which provides a particularly good picture of the elementary music instruction prevalent in church schools of the mid-18th century. Kürzinger's informative discussions of the various vocal ornaments employed in sacred music are important and have been little noted in musicological literature.

(3) Fortunatus Kürzinger (b 1743; d Freising, 31 March 1805). Singer. He sang in the chapel of the Prince-Bishop of Freising as a boy and later as a tenor. From 1766 to 1783 he served as chapel prefect and acted as substitute for the Kapellmeister, Placidus von Camerloher, as director of the chapel musicians.

(4) Paul Ignaz Kürzinger (b Mergentheim, Württemberg, 28 April 1750; d Vienna, after 1820). Composer, son of (2) Ignaz Franz Xaver. He received his musical training from his father. As a violinist he joined the orchestra of the electoral court at Munich in 1775, where in the same year his opera La Contessina was produced. Two years later he went to Regensburg to play in the orchestra of the Prince of Thurn and Taxis, and he directed the court opera theatre there from 1780 to 1783. While in Regensburg he wrote a number of operas and ballets. Later he moved to Vienna, where he continued to write theatrical works, including the opera Die Illumination for the Burgtheater in 1787. He became music director at a private school in Vienna, and remained there for the rest of his life.

Kusche, Benno (b Freiburg, 30 Jan 1916). German bass-baritone. He studied at Karlsruhe and made his début at Koblenz in 1938 as Melitone (La forza del destino). The next year he was engaged at Augsburg. In 1946 he was engaged by the Staatsoper in Munich, where he sang for over 30 years. At Salzburg in 1949 he took part in the first performance of Orff's Antigonae. He made his Covent Garden début in 1951 as Beckmesser; in 1953 he appeared there with the Munich company, as La Roche in the British première of Capriccio. At Glyndebourne he sang Leporello (1954), Don Fernando in Fidelio (1963) and La Roche (1963 and 1964). In 1971 he made his Metropolitan début as Beckmesser. Kusche's repertory included Papageno (which he sang in Felsenstein's 1954 production of Die Zauberflöte at the Komische Oper, Berlin), Alberich, Faninal, Figaro, Don Alfonso and Gianni Schicchi. His gifts as a character baritone were deployed most tellingly as Beckmesser and Alberich, both of which he recorded under Kempe, and as Faninal, which he sang in the 1979 video recording of Otto Schenk's Munich staging.

Kushta, Shpëtim (b Vlora, 8 April 1946). Albanian composer and teacher. After early training in Vlora he studied theory, solfège and the piano at the Jordan Misja Art Lyceum, Tirana (1960–64), and at the Tirana Conservatory (1964–9), where his teachers included Sandër Çefa, Ibrahimi, Lara and Zadeja. From 1969, apart from one year working as a 'free professional composer' salaried by the state (1989), he taught at the Tirana Conservatory, where he was made professor in 1995. In 1995–6 a European Community scholarship enabled him to attend specialization courses in pedagogy and composition at the Marseilles Conservatoire. In 1991 he succeeded Ibrahimi as music secretary of the Union of Albanian Writers and Artists.

Before 1990 Kushta composed mainly in a post-Romantic idiom, which exploited chromaticism at points of dramatic emphasis – his tone poem Alarmë të pergjakura ('Blood-Stained Alarms', 1969) became a staple of the Albanian orchestral repertory during the socialist period. Later, however, he successfully shifted to atonality in chamber music of remarkable aural sensibility, emotional restraint and nobility, such as his Refleksion no.2 (1995).

GEORGE LEOTSAKOS

Kusser, Johann Sigismund [Cousser, Jean Sigismond; Cousser, John Sigismond] (b Pressburg [now Bratislava], bap. 13 Feb 1660; d Dublin, Dec 1727). Composer of Hungarian parentage, active in Germany, England and Ireland. Walther established the highly significant fact that he spent six years in Paris studying with Lully, which must have been between 1674, when he moved to Stuttgart with his father, and 1682, when he was appointed to the court at Ansbach to train the violinists of the orchestra in the French style of playing. He left Ansbach in 1683, but there is no trace of him until 1690, when he became opera Kapellmeister at the court of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel. One could speculate that it was during these seven years that, in Walther's words, he 'travelled throughout Germany, and there would hardly be a place in which he was not known'. One also learns from Walther that 'because of his volatile and fiery temperament he was unable to remain long in one place'. At Wolfenbüttel Kusser quarrelled with F.C. Bressand, court poet and manager of the opera, who wrote the librettos for several of his works: he openly criticized both the quality of Bressand's poetry and the efficiency of his management of the opera, and this probably led to Kusser's departure from the court in 1694, when he moved to Hamburg.

In Hamburg Kusser seems almost immediately to have quarrelled with Jakob Kremberg, the manager of the opera. After perhaps only one performance of his opera Porus, Kusser withrew it. With the aid of Gerhard Schott he formed a competing company and performed Porus in the refectory of Hamburg Cathedral with considerable success, which deepened Kremberg's animosity. When Kremberg gave up the opera management some time in 1695 Kusser apparently took over as Kapellmeister, but only until 1696, when Schott became manager. Kusser formed his own travelling opera company, visiting Kiel for performances. He soon began to travel more widely with his company: he is known to have performed in Nuremberg and Augsburg during the 1697–8 season, in 1698 he appeared in Stuttgart and he apparently made several more journeys from there as guest conductor and opera impresario, including one to Munich. On 17 April 1700 he was appointed Oberkapellmeister at the court at Stuttgart; he visited Italy in 1701 to find musicians for the court. New disagreements, with both the Italian musicians and the church council, led him to abandon his post at Stuttgart on 19 March 1704, and on 25 December 1704 he arrived in London.

He spent only about two and a half years in London, leaving on 29 May 1707 and arriving in Dublin on 4 July. Apparently he spent the first few months in London as a private tutor and wrote music for well-known singers such as Giuliana Celotti and Arabella Hunt. In Dublin, according to Walsh, he was 'Chappel-Master of Trinity College' beginning in 1711, and in 1716 became 'Master of the Musick attending his Majesty's State in Ireland'. In this capacity he was responsible, among other things, for the music of court odes written annually to celebrate the birthdays of the British monarch, which were performed at Dublin Castle before the lord lieutenant or his representative (see Trowles). The surviving librettos show them to have been staged as serenatas, with costumes, scenery and possibly also dramatic action. The music of only one birthday ode, that for Queen Anne's 46th birthday in 1711, survives. It consists of a series of recitatives and arias preceded by a two-movement overture and followed by an imposing chaconne for ten solo singers and chorus; the orchestra includes woodwind and strings, but not trumpets and drums. On 16 June 1713 a serenata theatrale by Kusser was staged at the playhouse in Dublin in celebration of the Treaty of Utrecht (see Marx); on this occasion the orchestra did include trumpets and drums (see Walsh for a detailed description of the libretto).

The lack of information about the major part of Kusser's career in London and Dublin and the apparent loss of nearly all the music that he wrote from 1705 onwards, as well as of his earlier German operas (except for the arias mentioned below), make any judgment of him as a composer tentative. It is apparent that his close relationship with Lully and his considerable experience with Italian operas at Wolfenbüttel made him an exponent of the most recent developments in French and Italian music. Furthermore he learnt from Lully the superiority of French orchestral discipline, especially the brilliant violin playing for which the French court orchestra under Lully's direction was famous: not only did he teach the French style of violin playing at Ansbach, but much of his career grew out of his talent and experience as an outstanding director of opera. Mattheson (Der vollkommene Capellmeister, 1739, 480–81) singled him out as the supreme example of the orchestra director who combines strictness of discipline in rehearsals with open-hearted cooperation and devotion to teaching both the talented and less talented their parts.

Kusser's extant music includes four sets of orchestral suites, the 1711 birthday ode, the 1713 serenata and collections of arias from his operas Erindo and Ariadne. It has been claimed that Kusser brought the French operatic style to Hamburg, but this distinction must be given to Kusser's predecessor at Hamburg, J.G. Conradi. It can certainly be said, however, that Kusser consolidated and reinforced the introduction of the French style, which was already known to and probably much admired by Hamburg audiences. He was a lesser composer than his successors at the Hamburg opera, Keiser and Telemann. However, his surviving music shows sensitivity, and his simple strophic songs are often of great charm, very much in the tradition of the late 17th-century lied. He also excelled in longer arias of more dramatic appeal, with expressive vocal line and striking harmonic strength. He was far less influenced by Italian operatic practice than one might expect: although many of his arias are in da capo form, there are, for example, few lengthy melismatic passages. Much of his music is based on French dance forms, and like Conradi he frequently employed chaconne basses, both in individual arias and in longer, climactic scenes at the end of acts. The arias from Erindo show his predilection for solo instrumental passages in his arias, and both collections contain a number of homophonic duets in the French style.

An important contribution that Kusser made to Hamburg musical life and to the future of opera there was to introduce operas by non-German composers, including Gianettini, Carlo Pallavicino and especially Steffani. It was this, coupled with his exceptional ability as an orchestra director, more than his own operas, that changed the course of the Hamburg opera by raising the standards of musical performance and by developing a more cosmopolitan repertory.

Kutev, Philip (b Aitos, 13/26 June 1903; d Sofia, 27 Nov 1982). Bulgarian composer and conductor. At the Bulgarian State Music Academy, Sofia (1923–9), he studied theory with Khristov and the violin with Hans Koh and Todor Torchanov. After graduating he worked as a military bandmaster, first in Burgas (1930–35), then in Sofia, where he later became director of music to the Bulgarian army (1944). Concurrently, he was conductor of the Homeland Sounds orchestra and a violin teacher at the main music school in Burgas. In 1951 he founded the State Folksong and Dance Ensemble, which was renamed after its founder in 1982. He was a member of the early Bulgarian Contemporary Music society, and from 1954 to 1972 served as president of its successor, the Union of Bulgarian Composers. Kutev belongs to the second generation of Bulgarian composers; as such he was responsible for creating a national musical style. His work of the 1930s and early 40s embraces Bulgarian archaism and ritual-song motives, particularly in instances such as the symphonic poem German. Other works, for example the cantata Deveti septemvri ('The 9th of September'), have a heroic-dramatic quality that is typical of many of the works written between the mid-1940s and 50s. After the early 1950s his work with the State Folksong Ensemble caused him to focus principally on song, exploring in particular the open throat singing that was a characteristic of this female folk chorus. His choral arrangements of folksongs and textural use of timbre in this context served as a model for much subsequent Bulgarian choral music.

IVAN KHLEBAROV

Kuti [Ransome-Kuti; Anikulapo-Kuti], Fela (b Abeokuta, Nigeria 15 Oct 1938; d Lagos, 2 Aug 1997). Nigerian pop musician. He formed his first band, Koola Lobitos, in London while a student at Trinity College of Music (1958–63) where he studied the trumpet, music theory and composition. After returning to Nigeria (1963) he reorganized the band as Nigeria '70; the name was changed after a trip to the USA (1969) to Afrika '70, and finally to Egypt '80. From 1964 to 1979 the band was led by the drummer Tony Oladipo Allen. Formative musical influences on Fela Kuti include his indigenous Yoruba musical culture, classical training, exposure to jazz during his weekly radio programmes at the Nigerian Broadcasting Corporation, black American music (James Brown, John Coltrane, Miles Davis), literary works (The Autobiography of Malcom X) and political activists encountered during his trips to the USA. He proclaimed himself a disciple of the late pan-Africanist and president of Ghana, Dr Kwame Nkrumah.

Son of a minister and a union leader, he wrote lyrics characterized by scathing, politically charged and carefully coded rhetorics, shown in such titles as Confusion (EMI, 1975), Coffin for Head of State (Kalakuta, 1981) and Beasts of No Nation (Kalakuta; Eurobound/Yaba, 1989). His frequent attacks on Nigerian political leaders ended in arrest in November 1984; while in prison his band was led by his son Femi. He was released in 1986 and made his last international appearance on tour in the USA (June 1990). He died of AIDS-related causes.

Fela Kuti is credited with the origins of the substyle AFROBEAT, which is a fusion of various other styles including HIGHLIFE, bebop, rock, soul and funk. He played the keyboard and the saxophone and his preferred instrumentation included electric keyboards, percussion (indigenous and Western) and electric guitars. His lead vocals were usually backed by a female chorus of his harem of some 27 wives. Most of his recordings also feature extended solos, and sung portions often employ call-and-response formats. He made over 50 albums and many works remain unpublished.

Kuula, Toivo (Timoteus) (b Vaasa, 7 July 1883; d Viipuri, Finland [now Vyborg, Russia], 18 May 1918). Finnish composer. He studied the violin and music theory with Wegelius at the Helsinki Music Institute (1900–03), but lack of funds forced him to return to Vaasa. At Palmgren's suggestion Kuula enrolled again at the school in 1906, where he was encouraged by Järnefelt, and in 1908 he became Sibelius's first composition pupil. His principal student works, a violin sonata (1907) and a piano trio performed in 1908, attracted great attention because large-scale chamber works had only rarely been heard in Finland; Kuula was also perceived to be a young champion of music culture in the Finnish language. In 1908 he studied with Marco Enrico Bossi in Italy, and in 1909 with Hans Sitt in Leipzig and Marcel Labey in Paris. He was director of music in Oulu (1910–11), in Helsinki (1912–15) and in Viipuri (1916–18). In 1914 he married the singer Alma Silventoinen, for whom he wrote most of his songs and with whom he made extensive concert tours. He was killed in the final stages of the Finnish Civil War.

In Paris, where Kuula tremendously admired the new French music of Debussy, Dukas, Chausson and Magnard, he composed one of his most extensive a cappella songs for mixed chorus, Meren virsi ('Song of the Sea', E. Leino), a work which portrays well Kuula's grandiose expressive aspirations. Late Romantic harmony characterizes the passages where a single voice dominates, but the chorus has mostly a polyphonic treatment. At a second concert of his work in Helsinki in 1911 Kuula presented further compositions from his Paris period: Merenkylpijäneidot ('The Bathing Maids'), for soprano and orchestra, and Orjan poika ('The Serf's Son'), for soprano, baritone, mixed chorus and orchestra; both works set narrative poems in a folk style by Leino. This concert offered a 'total renewal of values', and the Finnish-language critic Evert Katila also declared that only one name now stood above Kuula's in Finnish music. Although Kuula's dark, impetuous, modally inclined Romanticism lies behind these works, there are also influences absorbed from the new French music, in particular in the orchestration. The orchestral tone pictures of the following year, Metsässä sataa ('It Is Raining in the Forest') and Hüdet virvoja viritti ('Demon Jack Lit his Lanterns'), have a colourful and varied orchestration reminiscent of the French, and the Impressionism of Debussy is even more evident. Kuula's principal work is his Stabat mater, for mixed chorus and orchestra; it occupied him until his death, whereupon it was completed by Madetoja. Stylistically the most varied of his large vocal pieces, it closes with an extensive fugue, while its earlier parts are dominated first by French-sounding, airy themes, then by a Wagnerian late Romanticism. The intensity of expression compensates for the stylistic anomalies and rhapsodic form, and it is among the most important works in Finnish music.

Kuula has become best known for his much-loved solo and partsongs, and for his arrangements of folk tunes from his native southern Ostrobothnia. His best songs (e.g. Tuijotin tulehen kauvan ('I gazed long into the fire'), Leino, 1907) have an individual melodic invention that he seldom achieved in his large-scale works. But Kuula is also noteworthy as a choral composer, and his partsongs can be divided into three types: complex polyphonic songs; simpler songs; and light, rhythmically expressive, even humorous songs, including the folk-style Kanteletar settings.

Kuusisto, Ilkka (b Helsinki, 26 April 1933). Finnish composer, conductor and arts administrator. The son of Taneli Kuusisto, Kuusisto studied at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki with Merikanto, Fougstedt and others. He taught at the School of Sacred Music in New York (1958–9), then became assistant head of music at the Finnish Broadcasting Company (1960–63) and director of music at Meilahti Congregation (1963–72). He has also been conductor of Helsinki City Theatre (1965–8 and 1971–5), rector of the Klemetti Institute (1969–71), lecturer at the Sibelius Academy (1975–84), artistic director of Fazer Music (1981–4) and director of the Finnish National Opera (1984–92). Kuusisto has conducted many choirs, including Laulu-Miehet (1968–75) and the Finnish Radio Chorus (1968–77).

Kuusisto's compositions, which range from jazz and film music to choral songs and operas, retain a tonal basis; their melodic quality is enhanced by a homophonic accompanying texture. He also displays a keen sense of humour in works such as Finnish Hospitality (based on a cookbook), and in the quotations and allusions of such works as the Moomin Opera. In his five-act opera The Battle for the Sun, combining themes from the national epic, the Kalevala, he uses archaic elements borrowed from medieval and folk music. Ensign Ståhl, drawing widely on Ostrobothnian minor-key melodies, is, according to Kuusisto, a more direct 'folk opera'.

Kuusisto, Taneli (b Helsinki, 19 June 1905; d Helsinki, 30 March 1988). Finnish composer and organist. In 1931 he graduated from the Helsinki Institute of Church Music and received a diploma in organ from the Helsinki Conservatory in 1935. He was organist of Töölö Church, Helsinki (1942–63), and he worked in the Helsinki Academy as teacher of liturgical organ playing and organ music history (1948–57), head of the church music department (1955–7), vice-director (1956–9) and director (1959–71). As a composer he has his roots in the national romantic tradition, although early in his career he showed some interest in Skryabin and Sibelius; later he developed a neoclassical, linear style reflecting his admiration for Bach. The best known of his works are the songs and psalm settings. He was the author of Musiikkimme eilispäivää ('Essays on Finnish music history', Porvoo, 1965).

Kuyper, Elisabeth [Lize] (Lamina Johanna) (b Amsterdam, 13 Sept 1877; d Viganello, 26 Feb 1953). Dutch composer and conductor. She studied with Daniël de Lange and Frans Coenen in Amsterdam (piano-teaching certificate 1895) and then with Max Bruch at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, where from 1908 to 1920 she taught theory and composition – the first woman to do so there. She was also the first woman to win the Mendelssohn state prize for composition, in 1905. The Berlin PO performed a number of her works: the Serenade (1905), the Ballade for Cello and Orchestra and the Violin Concerto (1908). After conducting the Sängerinnen-Verein of the Deutsche Lyceum-Club, she founded the Berlin Tonkünstlerinnen-Orchester in 1910. Both this and the other women's orchestras she founded in London (1922–3) and New York (1924–5) were well received but were forced to disband owing to lack of funds. With the London Women's SO Kuyper conducted the première of her Das Lied von der Seele. Kuyper left New York in 1925, living for a short period in Berlin, and then in various places in Switzerland. From 1939 until her death she lived in Muzzano, Switzerland. Much of Kuyper's output is characterized by rich modulatory development. Her early works, such as the Violin Sonata, were influenced by Bruch, but the Lieder op.17 contain refined harmonic colouring and daring modulations which betray the influence of Mahler and Strauss. Her later works, such as Dreams on the Hudson Waltz and American Lovesong, are light pieces of salon music.

He received much official recognition – including the Order of Lenin (1959) – and became a People's Artist of the USSR in 1987. The first professional Uighur composer, he devoted himself to the creation of a school of composition and a variety of new genres. His works are marked by a natural lyricism which is infused not only by Uighur folk music (and the Uighur muqam in particular) but also the national history, imagery and traditions.

RAZIA SULTANOVA

Kuznetsov, Vyacheslav Vladimirovich (b Vienna, 15 July 1955). Belarusian composer. He took first and second degrees under Yauhen Hlebaw at the National Conservatory in Minsk, where he has taught orchestration since 1987. He became a member of the Belarusian Composers' Union in 1985, and from 1987 headed that country's section of the ISCM. His earlier works linked him to the revival of interest in folk music and his association with the nationalist atmosphere of the years surrounding the break up of the Soviet Union resulted in favourable public opinion towards works such as Polonez ('Polonaise') based on dances by M. Oginski and the 18th-century composer Maciej Radziwiłł. In the more experimental works of the 1990s he made use of graphic notation, high-level organization, sonoristic techniques and original approaches to structure. In some of these compositions (which include Tseziy-137 ('Caesium-137'), written in response to the Chernobyl tragedy, Lenta Myobiusa ('Möbius Tape') and Euphonia for eight voices and 45 percussion instruments) he – like other members of the Belarusian avant garde – veers towards the techniques once used by Penderecki and Lutosławski.

VALENTINA ANTONEVICH

Kuznetsova, Mariya Nikolayevna (b Odessa, 1880; d Paris, 26 April 1966). Russian soprano. She first went into ballet at St Petersburg, then trained as a singer with Joakim Tartakov. Her operatic début at the Mariinsky Theatre as Marguerite in Faust was a triumph, and she remained with the company until 1913. Among the premières in which she took part was Rimsky-Korsakov's The Legend of the Invisible City of Kitezh (1907). From 1908 she developed a reputation abroad, and Paris became her second artistic home. At the Opéra she appeared in Chabrier's Gwendoline (1910), Massenet's Roma (1912; she had sung in the first performance earlier that year at Monte Carlo), as Aida and Norma, and created roles in Gunsbourg's Venise (1913) and Massenet's Cléopâtre (1914). She made her Covent Garden début in 1909 and took part in the famous Beecham Russian season at Drury Lane in 1914; there she sang Yaroslavna in the first performances of Prince Igor in England. As a dancer she also had a great success with her appearances in 1914, first in Paris then at Drury Lane, as Potiphar's wife, in Richard Strauss's ballet Josephs-Legende, a role which she created. In the USA she sang with the Manhattan Company and at Chicago, where in 1916 she created a sensation in the first production in America of Cléopâtre. She returned to Russia but fled from the Revolution to Sweden, disguised as a cabin-boy and hidden in a trunk. Her operatic career continued and she also sang operetta for a while (at Paris in 1934 she replaced Supervia in Lehár's Frasquita). She was still singing in 1936, when a company of Russian émigrés she had formed in 1929 visited Japan. Kuznetsova's repertory ranged from Salome, Aida and Norma to the lighter lyric roles such as Mimì and Gounod's Juliet. Her vibrant tone and expressive style are well caught on recordings, which include a number of Russian and Spanish songs.

Kuźnik, Norbert (Mateusz) (b Rybnik, 8 Jan 1946). Polish composer and organist. Between 1965 and 1974 he studied music theory and composition with Dobrowolski at the Warsaw Academy. In 1981–2 he was a pupil of Roman Haubenstock-Ramati at the Hochschule für Musik in Vienna; further study took him to Utrecht and Amsterdam.

Kuźnik, who was most active as a composer in the 1970s and 80s, is best known for his music for organ. He is a performer of the contemporary repertory, the author of educational material for the instrument, and a specialist in organ construction and conservation. Several of his pieces, for example Multiplicatio, are for prepared organ and contain virtuoso writing in the course of pursuing registral and textural contrasts. While he has recourse to a modernist vocabulary that includes clusters and swathes of sound, such effects may be also juxtaposed with repetitive and quasi-tonal materials in a loose-limbed and occasionally humorous manner; this is particularly true of Anaphora and Duo. A more brutish side to his musical expression is heard in Góroliki, which uses folk music of the Polish mountain region.

Kvam, Oddvar S(chirmer) (b Oslo, 26 Sept 1927). Norwegian composer and lawyer. He studied the piano and theory at the Oslo Conservatory and composition privately with David Monrad Johansen, in Oslo, and Herman D. Koppel, in Copenhagen. As well as his roles in the legal domain – he is a prominent laywer – Kvam has held several important positions in musical and cultural public life. He was president of the Norwegian Council for Cultural Affairs (1985–92), and of the Norwegian section of the ISCM; he is president of TONO, the Norwegian performing rights society, and serves on the board of its international equivalent CISAC. He has been awarded the royal order of St Olav.

Although his music was initially rooted in neo-classicism, Kvam has developed to write in a very free and undogmatic manner. His choral music in particular has received recognition and several prizes, and his chamber music and piano music is also in demand. His opera The Dream about the 13th Hour was a commission from the Norwegian Opera.

ARVID O. VOLLSNES

Kvandal, (David) Johan (Jacob) (b Oslo, 8 Sept 1919; d Oslo, 16 Feb 1999). Norwegian composer. The son of the composer David Monrad Johansen, he began composing at an early age and studied with Tveitt in Oslo. He qualified as an orchestral conductor at the Oslo Conservatory (1947) and spent a year studying choral conducting at the Stockholm Conservatory. He also received a degree as an organist and worked in that capacity for many years in churches in Oslo. He studied with Joseph Marx at the Vienna Musikhochschule (1950–51) and with Boulanger in Paris (1952–4). He also worked with Blacher in Berlin. As well as composing, Kvandal was a respected critic for leading newspapers in Oslo. His thoroughness and methodical thinking was beneficial to the various boards and committees he joined; he also formed an anthology of recorded and printed classical Norwegian music for the Norwegian Cultural Council.

His early works are dominated by the use of melodic and rhythmic elements of Norwegian folk music, yet he thought always in broader lines and large spans and forms. These tendencies were enhanced during his studies in the 1950s, resulting in a free way of using the tonal elements, form and polyphony of both French and German neo-classical movements. In the late 1960s there were elements of a 'transformed' Norwegian folk music in his works, combined with experiments in serial techniques and freer forms but without conceding expressivity. His orchestral work Antagonia (1972) was an immediate success, and commissions increased thereafter. Known as a musician's composer, Kvandal received several prizes, including the Lindeman Prize (1984). In later years he spent considerable time on his opera Mysterier, based on Knut Hamsun's novel. This was a commission from the Norwegian Opera, who gave its première in 1994; the opera was also broadcast throughout Europe in 1996.

Kvapil, Jaroslav (b Fryšták, Zlín district, 21 April 1892; d Brno, 18 Feb 1959). Czech composer, teacher, conductor and pianist. He was a chorister in Olomouc and a pupil of Nešvera there (1902–6). In 1909 he graduated from the Brno School of Organists under Janáček, and later studied with Reger at the Leipzig Conservatory (1911– 13). He taught at the School of Organists and at the Brno Conservatory, and he was appointed professor of composition at the academy in 1947. His pupils included M. Ištvan, C. Kohoutek and J. Matys. Kvapil was an excellent accompanist, noted for his skill in sight reading. As the choirmaster and conductor of the Brno Beseda (1919–47) he gave the Czech premières of Bach's St Matthew Passion (1923), Honegger's Judith (1933) and Szymanowski's Stabat mater (1937). He received the Award of Merit in 1955. In his music Kvapil worked best in traditional forms, particularly variation form, and showed a partiality for contrapuntal textures. His Romantic style included few immediate references to folk music, but he achieved a simple and direct expression. The oratorio Lví srdce ('The Lionheart') achieved popularity through its treatment of the struggle for Czech independence during World War I. However, it is his smaller pieces that have the most lasting value.

JAN TROJAN

Kvapil, Radoslav (b Brno, 15 March 1934). Czech pianist. He studied with Ludvík Kundera, made his début in Brno (1950) and has played in many European cities. He formed a duo with the cellist Stanislav Apolín (1958–66) and played in the Dvořák Piano Trio (1969–92). He has made a complete recording of the neglected piano works of Dvořák. From Kundera, a Janáček pupil, he gained valuable insight into that composer, and took part in a biographical film about him. In 1968, and again in 1989, he recorded Janáček's complete piano works, and in 1975 those of Voříšek; this was followed by an eight-volume anthology of Czech piano music, recorded between 1993 and 1996. His repertory also includes contemporary Czech works by Fišer, Piňos, Karel Reiner, Kohoutek and Ištvan, some of which are dedicated to him. His well-considered, affectionate approach, and his ability to catch the national traits of the works he plays, rank him among the leading interpreters of Czech piano music. He also gives lectures and masterclasses.

ALENA NĚMCOVÁ

Kvernadze, Bidzina (b Signagi, eastern Georgia, 29 July 1928). Georgian composer and teacher. He graduated from the Tbilisi State Conservatory in 1953 having studied composition under Andria Balanchivadze, and from 1963 taught orchestration and composition there. He was made a professor in 1987 and in 1995 became head of the composition department. The secretary of the Georgian Composers' Union, he is an Honoured Artist of the Georgian SSR (1966), People's Artist of the Georgian SSR (1979), and a laureate of the Paliashvili Prize (1981) and the Rustaveli State Prize (1985).

Kvernadze's work has played a large part in the fundamental renewal of the various genres of Georgian music. The evolution of his art demonstrates the rapidity with which, during the 1950s and 60s, 20th-century Western techniques were assimilated by Georgian composers. From the start, he sought to overcome the stereotypes of the Georgian Romantic school, aligning himself with other 20th-century stylistic currents, such as that typified by Ravel, while retaining certain national traits. The poetic lyricism of Kvernadze's music was first embodied in the Tsekva-Phantasia ('Dance-Fantasia') of 1959 and Seraphita of 1965, whose colourful variations of themes linked to folk dance elements incoporate flexible modulations and striking changes of mood and atmosphere. These tendencies are again evident in the ballet Khoreographiuli novelebi ('Choreographic Novellas'), impressions of four pictures by the Georgian artist Gudiashvili. Here, the bodily gestures and movements depicted in the paintings translate easily and freely into the plasticity of the impressionistic orchestral texture and the music as a whole.

In the 1960s, alongside works bearing a markedly impressionistic character, Kvernadze also wrote in a somewhat constructivist style; this evolution was completed with the one-act ballet Berikaoba (1973) – based on a traditional Georgian mummers' play – where images of unbridled strength arise from the use of motoric structures formed from relentless ostinati. The music's intensity is reinforced by polyrhythm, irregularly accented variation and the use of harsh polytonal and dissonant harmonies, including clusters.

Kvernadze's original musical thinking extends to his treatment of vocal genres, in which a simplified and stricter means of expression strives to find stability in the intransient spiritual values of the past. The language is derived from various tradition, of Georgian and western European sacred music.. The ascetic music of Chemi lotsva ('My Prayer') (1974) – at times strict in its modes of expression – has its basis in Georgian church singing and reinterprets the neo-classical aesthetic of Stravinsky, Honegger and Orff. The phonetic impulses of Georgian speech results in a new kind of recitative that preserves the natural intonation of the language.

The opera Iko mervesa tselsa … ('And in the Eighth Year …') – Kvernadze's pivotal work – represents a synthesis of his previous achievements. Various dramatic devices, including pantomime, are used to create an allegorical expression of the saintly life, with the action mainly taking the form of laconic dialogues. The text of the libretto, combining tragedy and farce, epic with lyric and prayer with the everyday, presents a wide field for the composer's imagination. The opera is cast in the form of a retrospective narrative in which a sequence of recollections is recounted by Yako (the author of a hagiography), the prototype for whom was probably the Evangelist in Bach's Passions. The image of the martyred queen Shushanik is central to the music and is illuminated in lyrical and dramatic passages, as well as in the hymn-like musical episodes, with their astringent polymodality and pulsating rhythmic ostinati. The severe choral writing, a product of the neo-classical language of the work, does not preclude occasional breaks into Romantic lyricism; Shushanik's theme, with its high level of emotional expression, is cast in this mould and, while symbolizing the spiritual catharsis of the heroine, stands as evidence of Kvernadze's rich melodic gift.

Kverno, Trond (b Oslo, 20 Oct 1945). Norwegian composer. He graduated as a church musician from the Oslo Conservatory of Music in 1967. In the following year he took a degree in music theory and choir direction and has since then served as organist and choirmaster in several churches in Norway. He began teaching music theory at the Oslo Conservatory in 1971, and in 1994 was appointed professor in church music there, specializing in composition and improvisation. In 1996 he was ordained a priest in the Old Catholic Church.

As a composer Kverno has dedicated himself to church music. He has been a member of the liturgical commission (1976–8) on the reform of the liturgical books of the Church of Norway (Lutheran). The Norwegian Sunday Eucharist service includes several of his melodies, and the Norwegian Hymnbook of 1985 includes 23 hymns, which also feature in hymnbooks elsewhere in Scandinavia, Germany and the USA. Kverno's most important work is the St Matthew Passion for soloists and double choir a cappella (1986). At 90 minutes' duration, it is one of the few monumental works of Scandinavian sacred music from the 1980s, incorporating a wide range of stylistic allusions, from liturgical recitation to Norwegian religious folksong, and utilizing a variety of experimental choral techniques.

Kvitka, Klyment (b Kiev, 4 Feb 1880; d Moscow, 19 Sept 1953). Ukrainian ethnomusicologist. The husband of the Ukrainian poet Lesya Ukraïnka (d 1913), he was at first a lawyer, later becoming a judge and devoting himself wholly to music only from 1920. He was director of the Ethnomusicology Bureau at the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (1922–33); during the 1920s his fieldwork was involved primarily with ritual songs, but also included the music of minority peoples (Bulgarians, Albanians and the Greeks along the Azov Sea), and the everyday life of professional folk musicians. In 1933 he moved to Moscow, where he founded and led the Folk Music Bureau at the Moscow Conservatory. In this period he concentrated on the study of folk instruments, continued to map the exact geographical spread of folksongs and instruments, and worked on the historical stages of calendar songs. Kvitka's song collections, published in 1917–18 and 1922, are landmarks in Ukrainian folk music scholarship, the second being among the greatest field collections covering the entire Ukraine. Many of his studies remain unpublished, but the Russian edition of his selected works, edited by Hoshovsky, contains important articles, a few never published before. His work is notable for its high scholarly standards and remarkable erudition (he knew 13 languages, including Georgian), as well as for the variety of problems considered and the methodology devised to solve them.

Kwaya (Kiswahili: 'choir'). East African choral music. The source for contemporary kwaya music in East Africa is the homophonic vocal music introduced by Protestant missions in the 19th century. Other origins include Roman Catholic missions employing unaccompanied monophonic melodies for congregational singing. Today the kwaya music of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Tanzania best exemplifies the richness of historic and contemporary kwaya music in East Africa.

Kwaya music has participated in the century-long dialogue between the colonial-mission presence and indigenous cultures in East Africa. The songs, anthems, choruses and hymns of the European colonial and mission era in East Africa continue to be performed in Tanzanian churches. Today they frequently co-exist with the newer, more contemporary sounds of popular kwaya musics that emerged in the period since independence in the 1960s.

Hymns were the initial bearers of Christian orthodoxy in East Africa; their texts carried powerful political ideology. Hymnbooks of European song texts translated into local languages (including Kiswahili) were widely distributed throughout East Africa by 19th-century missionaries. Linguistic difficulties often occurred in hymns, however, including differences in accent stress between European and Bantu languages.

Isolated early attempts at indigenizing hymns in local musical traditions were not always successful. Early in the 20th century deliberate attempts were made to create an African form of worship music; it was then that a truly Tanzanian kwaya music began to emerge. Early efforts to include Tanzanian musical instruments, rhythms and melodies were not successful. The use of ngoma ('drums'), for example, was inseparable from the traditions and practices of the ethnic groups from which they came. Thus, ngoma carried a non-Christian association for many early converts. Newer indigenous hymns have introduced something unique, in both musical and spiritual terms.

In the 1920s and 30s changes occurred in Tanzanian Christian music; missionaries and local composers began to modify European texts more freely, adopt local melodies and involve local traditions to a greater extent. After independence, Tanzanian kwaya music developed along with new and growing cultural identities. Radio Tanzania of Dar es Salaam initiated frequent broadcasts of kway music, and political kwayas were established that drew heavily on the musical repertories of pre-existing religious kwaya traditions.

Hymnbooks produced in post-independence Tanzania include a greater number of hymns inspired by indigenous culture. The 1945 Lutheran service book Nyimbo za Kikristo ('Christian Songs') included only five hymns based on Tanzanian melodies. In Mwimbieni Bwana ('Let us Sing to the Lord'), the 1988 revised Lutheran service book, 58 hymns of Tanzanian or African origin were introduced.

Tanzania's colonial past and independent present co-exist in contemporary kwaya music. Early kwaya music developed into several contemporary performance genres: kwaya ya matarumbeta (brass bands playing traditional kwaya repertories), kwaya ya maombolezo (singing bereavement communities drawing on traditional kwaya repertories), institutional and parastatal kwayas working closely with composers of religious kwaya music, as well as the daily service kwayas of the Christian churches. While kwayas are obliged to maintain and preserve older music traditions, they are also expected to participate in the formation and development of the newer more popular kwaya traditions as well.

The emergence of kwaya music as a contemporary Tanzanian popular genre is a direct result of processes of technology, transmission and modernization of mass media: radio, improved recording facilities, affordable prices of audio cassettes access to dubbing equipment for the mass production of kwaya cassettes and the greater availability of electronic instruments and equipment.

Kwela. Isizulu term for an urban musical genre popular in southern Africa during the 1950s and early 60s. According to South African musicologist Elkin Sithole, use of the term in music first occurred during the 1940s in connection with a new Zulu vocal music known as the 'bombing style' (Kubik, 1974, p.13; Rycroft, 1957, p.33). When the leader wanted the chorus to respond, he shouted 'kwela'! 'Kwela-kwela' expressed the continuous responses of the chorus.

1. History. 2. Form.

1. HISTORY. Kwela became associated with bands of flute-playing youths in South African townships in the 1950s. Under the influence of jazz records and cinema in the 1940s featuring North American big band jazz by Count Basie, Woody Herman, Lionel Hampton, Glenn Miller, Cab Calloway and others, the ambition of young boys was to emulate swing jazz with the means accessible to them. The reed and brass sections of the North American bands were represented by metal, end-blown flutes, locally called 'pennywhistles', and a new playing technique developed. The double bass was represented by a one-string skiffle bass made from a tea chest (see Benseler, 1973–4 for a photograph) and the playing techniques of an older African instrument, the ground-bow, were revived (fig.1).

A new style emerged, generally called 'jive' by the performers. The mass media gradually became interested, and, according to David Rycroft, pennywhistle playing first became popular after a locally made film, The Magic Garden, featured a pennywhistle boogie played by a crippled boy (1958, p.55). The new music increasingly heard on street corners in Johannesburg, Cape Town and other large cities soon attracted the attention of South African record company talent scouts and was then marketed as 'New Sound', 'Flute Jive' and 'Kwela'. Some of its exponents became stars, in particular Spokes Mashiyane ('King Kwela') and Lemmy Special Mabaso.

The record industry readily adopted the term kwela for the genre.

In the late 1950s kwela music spread to the states of the then Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (1954–63), now Zimbabwe, Zambia and Malawi, where it gained new roots. During the 1960s it developed particularly in Malawi by the musician-composers Daniel and Donald Kachamba (Kubik, 1974; Malamusi, 1994, pp.34–9). With some modifications and a great number of original compositions, Donald Kachamba is one of the last surviving authentic representatives of the kwela tradition in contemporary southern Africa. He has played the flute since he was eight years old, when his family lived in Harare, Zimbabwe, and his elder brother, the late Daniel Kachamba trained him. At the age of 14, he impressed audiences with his prolific solo variations (see the film, Kachamba Brothers 1967, part 1, 'Where can I get Emery', a ten-bar rock blues). Since 1972 he has been on concert and lecture tours in no fewer than 33 countries and has released recordings and films. Among his most remarkable contributions as a composer are his multiple flute pieces recorded with a playback technique (Kubik, 1979–80). His music integrates the experience of 1950s kwela with contemporaneous central and southern African styles.

2. Form. Kwela music is based on short, four-segment harmonic cycles such as: $CFCG_7$ and $CC_7F(_6)G_7$. These cycles, expanded and circumscribed by substitute chords, have continued into the more recent forms of South African popular music such as simanje-manje and Mbaqanga. Jazz-type chorus forms are occasionally found in kwela, as is the 12-bar blues form, for example in Lemmy Special Mabaso's '4th Avenue Blues'.

Beginning in 1958, South African pennywhistle players used flutes marketed by the Hohner company of Trossingen, Germany, and developed for mass production from samples collected by a Hohner agent in Johannesburg from a township youth who had made them locally. Unprotected by patent laws, the original designer will probably never be known. The Hohner flutes were available in C, B♭ and G. At the height of the kwela craze, Hohner sold up to 100,000 annually in South Africa alone.

The Hohner flute has a cylindrical bore and six finger-holes. In the manufacturing process, a nickel-plated brass tube is sawn off and galvanized, then the head or mouthpiece is formed. Kwela musicians developed a unique embouchure. From the view of the player, the flute is rotated 45° and pushed relatively deep into the inner side of the right cheek, resulting in an oblique head position. The oblique embouchure guarantees that the edge and pipe remain open between the lips of the player (fig.2). The purpose of the deeper insertion of the flute is to obtain a full, round and much louder tone, as the cavity of the mouth, such as in the performance of the mqangala (mouth-bow), becomes a variable resonating chamber.

Blue notes, jazz-type glides and chromatic intermediate sounds were achieved by slight modification of embouchure, finger smearing etc. Several types of trill were also employed. Much of this technique can be studied in the film made of Donald Kachamba (Encyclopaedia Cinematographica E2328, Göttingen), who plays with the original kwela embouchure and fingering technique.

GERHARD KUBIK

Kyagambiddwa, Joseph (b Masaka district, 1928; d ?Masaka, ?1978). Ugandan composer and poet. He was educated in Catholic seminaries in Uganda and later in Xavier University, New Orleans, and Manhattanville College, Purchase, New York. He is best known for his Ugandan Martyrs African Oratorio (Rome, 1964) but also for numerous hymns, carols and other choral songs which are sung in churches throughout the country. The first Ugandan to describe traditional Buganda music, he provided notations in his pioneering work African Music from the Source of the Nile (New York and London, 1956). In it he transcribed and analysed instrumental and bardic compositions, many of them learnt from musicians to the the kabaka (king) of Buganda.

He taught at several teachers' colleges, then from 1965 to about 1975 at the National Teachers' College, Kampala, where he specialized in composition, choir training and Buganda music studies. Believing passionately in the need to find an African idiom for Catholic worship, he was one of the first Ugandan composers to specify that traditional instruments be used in church to accompany his carols and hymns. He composed both texts and melodies in as near a traditional style as possible in his vernacular Luganda, succeeding in preserving most effectively the traditional rules for composition with relation to language rhythm and speech tone (Luganda is a tonal language). At the beginning of his career his attempts to Africanize the liturgy met with opposition from some of the Catholic clergy and from his peers who were often more interested in imitating European styles of religious music. Later his compositions were accepted by the church and its leadership gave support to his composing. He came to be regarded as the finest Kiganda religious composer. Information on his later career is sketchy since Uganda suffered much turbulence during the period 1972–86. His faith lapsed during his later years, but he was reconciled to the church shortly before his death. Much of his output has been circulated only in cyclostyled sheets, though in 1997 steps were being taken to publish more of his music.

Kyllönen, Timo-Juhani (b Saloinen, nr Hämeenlinna, 1 Dec 1955). Finnish composer. At the age of two his family moved to Sweden, where he began accordion studies some years later. In 1973 he returned to Finland, and in 1976 moved to the Soviet Union for ten years, initially to study the accordion at the Gnesin Institute in Moscow, and then (from 1982) composition at the Moscow Conservatory. In 1986 the conservatory organized a concert of his works; it was the first concert the institution had devoted to the work of a foreign student of composition. He returned to Finland in 1986; since then he has taught theory and chamber music at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki. He has also been a teacher of music theory at the University of Helsinki. Concerts of Kyllönen's work have been given in Finland, France, Sweden, Germany, Ireland and Israel.

His emotionally powerful music, strongly melodic and propelled by motivic development, stems from the Russian tradition of Shostakovich and Prokofiev, but Finnish and Latin-American influences are also present. In slow movements there can be moody reflection, in fast movements often striking rhythm and energy. His principal works include two symphonies (1985–6, 1992–7), two string quartets (1984–5, 1989), the large-scale choral work Passio secularis (1988–9) and the children's opera Kuninkaiden kirja ('The Book of Kings', 1992–7).

Kynaston, Nicolas (b Morebath, Devon, 10 Dec 1941). English organist and teacher. He was a chorister at Westminster Cathedral under George Malcolm and from 1957 to 1960 a pupil of Fernando Germani in Siena, after which he studied at the RCM with Ralph Downes. At 19 he succeeded Malcolm as organist of Westminster Cathedral; while there he made some memorable recordings and established a popular series of organ recitals. In 1971 he left the cathedral in order to pursue a solo career; he took part in the 1973 Reger centenary celebrations in Germany and the following year made his first tour of the USA. Kynaston has subsequently made an international reputation as a recitalist and recording artist. He is a noted interpreter of large-scale Romantic works, particularly by Liszt and Reger, and frequently sits on the juries of international organ competitions. Many of his recordings have won international awards. He has also designed some significant organs, including those of the Singapore Concert Hall, St Chad's Cathedral, Birmingham, Tewkesbury Abbey and Bath Abbey. Kynaston is also a distinguished teacher. He was awarded an honorary fellowship by the Royal College of Organists in 1976, and was president of the Incorporated Association of Organists in 1983–5. In 1995 he was appointed organist of the Megaron concert hall in Athens, where he has also started an organ school.

Kyoto. City in Japan. It was the country's capital from 794 to 1868. Together with the nearby city of Osaka it represents the distinct musical tradition known as the Kamigata style, in contrast to the Edo style of Tokyo. In Kyoto the traditions of gagaku (court music), shōmyō (Buddhist chant), nō drama and many other kinds of vocal music were firmly established and carried on for centuries. Gagakuryō (the Imperial Music Bureau), which has handed down the music and dance traditions of both gagaku and mikagura (the Shintō ritual), had its centre here until it was moved to Tokyo at the time of the Meiji Restoration (1868).

In early 9th century two important shōmyō traditions were established in Kyoto, one at Tōji of the Shingon sect by Priest Kūkai in 806, and the other at Enryakuji of the Tendai sect by Priest Saichō in 847; the centre of the Shingon shōmyō was later moved to Mt Kōya, south of Osaka. The two traditions have remained the most representative of the shōmyō schools. During the 10th and 11th centuries a number of new vocal styles, such as saibara, imayō and azuma-asobi, were popularized in the town, while heikyoku, the recitation of the Tale of Heike with a biwa accompaniment, appeared after 1185 as the earliest genre of narrative singing. All these vocal traditions originated in Kyoto and later spread to other provinces.

The tradition of nō drama was also established in Kyoto in the late 14th century. There are still many excellent nō stages for private use, of which the most important is at the temple of Nishi-honganji; also notable are the private stage belonging to the Kongo school, and the Kanze Theatre (opened in 1958). The origin of kabuki goes back to about 1600, when the dancer Okuni gave her performance on a stage by the river Kamo in Kyoto; Minami-za, the present kabuki theatre, stands on the same riverside. The nearby Gion area is famous as the headquarters of traditional singing and dancing, particularly jiuta songs and dances.

The Kyoto Municipal SO, founded in 1956, was the first European-style orchestra in Japan operated by a local government. Of choral groups active in the town the best known is Dōshisha Glee Club, a student organization. The most important music hall is the Kyōto Kaikan, built in 1960, while the small Aoyama Music Memorial Hall (1987) is specifically designed for Baroque music. There are competent music departments at Kyoto City University of Arts, Kyoto University of Education and Dōshisha Women's College.

MASAKATA KANAZAWA

Kyreyko, Vitaly Dmytrovych (b Shyroke, Dnipropetrovs'k district, 23 December 1926). Ukrainian composer and pedagogue. He studied under Revutsky at the Kiev Conservatory, graduating in 1949, and became professor there in 1978. Although best known for his stage works such as the opera Lisova pisnya ('Forest Song'), and the ballet Tini zabutykh predkiv ('Shadows of Forgotten Ancestors') he is a prolific composer of symphonies, concertos, chamber music and vocal works. Much of his music, especially the operas and ballets, are closely linked to Ukrainian folklore while his lyrical persuasion is especially apparent in such works as U nedilyu rano zillya kopala ('On Sunday Morning She Gathered Herbs') of 1965. His neo-romantic style is both nationalist and conservative and is strongly influenced by Revutsky. His melodic and harmonic writing and phrase structure are notable for their clarity; in the operas and ballets the characterization is distinct and direct. His music demonstrates that he was well attuned to the Ukrainian tradition established by Lysenko as well the principles of socialist realism; unsurprisingly, the emergence of the Kiev avant garde in the 1960s had little effect on him, other than provoking hostility. A book on Kyreyko by K. Mayburova was published in Kiev in 1979.

VIRKO BALEY

Kyrgyzstan, Republic of. Country in Central Asia, formerly part of the USSR. It is bounded by Uzbekistan to the west, Kazakhstan to the north, China to the east and Tajikistan to the south.

1. Musical regions. 2. Vocal genres: (i) Songs (ii) Epics. 3. Instrumental music: (i) Instruments (ii) Music. 4. The early Soviet period. 5. Opera, ballet, orchestral and chamber music.

1. MUSICAL REGIONS. When Central Asia was reorganized territorially on a national basis in 1924, Kyrgyzstan was separated from Turkestan and formed into an autonomous region within the Russian Soviet Socialist Republic (fig.1). It is perhaps not surprising, then, that musical styles within a republic with such recent political borders express affiliations with those of its neighbours. Three musical styles may be identified: in the northern area (the Issyk-Kul and Naryn regions and the Chuy valley), styles are similar to those of neighbouring Kazakhs; Kyrgyz clans in the mountains of the north-western area (the Talas and Chatkal valleys and a part of the Fergana valley) use styles that seem more obviously indigenous; and the styles of those in the southern area (the Osh region) share features with neighbouring Uzbeks. In general, recitative styles prevail in southern Kyrgyzstan while more melodic styles are found in the north.

Music, both vocal and instrumental, plays an important role in Kyrgyz life.

2. Vocal genres.

(i) Songs. Early European accounts of the Kyrgyz continually refer to the local habit of extempore singing for all occasions. When two Kyrgyz meet, they exchange formalized greeting-songs to place each other in terms of clan or family affiliation. While working, or to pass the time while walking, the Kyrgyz improvise song texts to stereotyped melodic motifs. This practice, known as kaila, is also found among other Central Asian Turks (notably the Kazakhs), although early Western travellers asserted that the Kyrgyz had developed such extemporization most extensively.

There are several major folksong genres. The important work songs are the dambir tash, an incantation to the spirits of agriculture and livestock; the shirildang, a cowboy song; the bekbekei, a shepherdess's song; and the op maida, a ploughing and harvesting song probably related to the Uzbek genre of the same name. Among ritual songs the zharamazan, sung during the Muslim month of Ramadan, zhar-zhar (wedding songs) and the koshok, a versatile genre heard both as a funeral lament and as a wedding song, are most important. Other named genres include three types of love-song reflecting different aspects of love (küigön, arman, seketbay); age-graded categories (qizdar iri, kelinder iri and jigitter iri for girls, women and youths respectively); and two important contemporary genres (kolkhoz iri about collective farms and jashlik iri about the youth movement). There are also lullabies (beshik iri) and a wide variety of game songs, such as the selkinchek swinging song.

A whole group of traditional song types is the exclusive domain of the professional minstrel (akyn). This includes the arnoo, a panegyric for the singer's patron; the kordoo, defaming the musician's or patron's enemies; the congratulatory kuttuktoo; and the didactic sanat or nasiat. These frequently reached their highpoint of development in traditional singing contests (aitish), akin to similar competitions among the Kazakhs. Rules for the contests demanded excellence in improvisation in stated forms, such as songs with specific alliterative patterns or on given topics. Instrumental virtuosity might also be the point contested. Performers built their reputations on a series of victories.

(ii) Epics. Manas is the central Kyrgyz heroic epic cycle performed by male *manaschi*s or Manas bards (known as zhomokchu in pre-Soviet times). Orally transmitted, its manner of recitation could sometimes enable the bard to enter into a dissociated state or 'trance'. Many *manaschi*s described being called to their trade in dreams by the spirits of the hero Manas and his 40 companions. If they attempted resistance, it was met with severity and threats from Manas. After a period of initiation and a pilgrimage to Manas's shrine, the musician became a manaschi for life. These experiences, together with the bard's change of consciousness, are evidence of the believed spiritual power of epic performance. Manas also had ethnic significance as a chronicle of the Kyrgyz people. Both of these associations led to its performance being forbidden at times during the Soviet period. In contemporary Kyrgyzstan, Manas is taught in schools. *Manaschi*s remain particularly highly esteemed musicians, often achieving great renown; in pre-Soviet times, such celebrated reciters could become 'tribal' leaders.

Manas is an encyclopedic epic, including all the major genres of Kyrgyz oral expression, although the people themselves clearly separate epic from other types of song and narrative. Mime and dramatization are important components of performance. *Manaschi*s can recite the tale almost indefinitely; a 20th-century version of 400,000 lines was transcribed from the bard SAYAKBAI KARALAYEV. Manas consists of three cycles, the first dealing with Manas himself and the second and third with his son Semetey and grandson Seytek.

Manas performances are built up by combining a variety of reciting styles without instrumental accompaniment. The manaschi keeps his hands free to enable a series of gesticulations and mimetic poses that relate to the epic's narrative. These gesticulations and poses, together with other techniques, such as the gradual intensification of their recitatives, are taught to pupils according to different traditions. Performance of the epic involves a solo dramatization of multiple roles within a traditional form of 'musical drama'.

Manas has no prose sections but is recited completely in verse. There are four main types of recitation: emotionally excited, exalted speech (practically impossible to notate using European musical transcription); the musical tirade, an indefinite number of poetical-musical lines joined by one rhyme, with single shouts in-between; musical phrases reminiscent of the Kyrgyz genre of lamentation, koshok; and the 'musical call' of 4 + 3 or 5 + 3 syllables that forms the structural core of the epic. V.S. Vinogradov stated that an evening may begin with the zhorgo syoz manner, characterized by a measured pace and gradually evolving melodic line; this pattern may also occur in mid-tale as relief from the more active sections, which consist of long recitation, increasing in intensity, of single melodic motifs. At other points more prosaic narrative styles may predominate, such as the zheldirme (gallop), a type of rapid agitated recitation. The manaschi's skill resides in controlling the audience's mood carefully through a flexible narrative style.

The Kyrgyz term zhomok includes epic and all other narrative genres (zhoo zhomok, fairytale, tamsil, fable, tabishmak, riddle), and is opposed to ir, or song in the sense of a poetic form (a division which may be difficult for outsiders to grasp). Obon is the term for tune. An akyn usually used 15 to 20 obon but often applied the same obon to different song texts.

3. INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

(i) Instruments. The Kyrgyz lute, the komuz, unlike any neighbouring lutes of Central Asia, has three strings; in the most common tunings the middle string is the highest in pitch. Other unusal aspects are its lack of frets and its emphasis on varied right-hand strokes (fig.2). One piece (Mash botoi) consists of a simple tune repeated many times, each with a new stroke, as a test of the performer's skill and creativity. There are two other principal Kyrgyz instruments, both of which are directly related to those of the Kazakhs. These are the kiak (fig.2), a two-string fiddle akin to the Kazakh QOBUZ (and possibly the West Mongolian ihil), which has a body shaped like a ladle and strings of horsehair, and the choor, a long, open end-blown flute with three or four finger-holes. The metal jew's harp (temir komuz) is also used. The number of instruments used by the Kyrgyz was formerly expanded by borrowings from the military bands of the nearby Uzbek kingdoms, including the SURNĀY (shawm), sarbasnai (an end-blown open flute about 60 cm long with fingerholes and one thumb-hole) and doolbas (small kettledrum).

(ii) Music. Kyrgyz instrumental music has a narrative emphasis, in that nearly every piece contains an implied story. This is also true of Kyrgyz decorative art, in which each facet of ornamentation on a rug or necklace can be read as a symbol, the whole constituting a precise scene or story. The programmatic approach is well illustrated by the following widespread tale forming the basis of a *komuz*piece called Aksak kulan ('The Lame Wild Ass'):

> A khan forbade his favourite son to hunt wild asses. Disobeying his father, the youth was killed by a wounded animal while out hunting. Fearing the worst, the khan decreed that anyone bringing bad tidings would have his lips sealed by a dipperful of molten lead. The ruler's favourite minstrel then rose and played an instrumental piece depicting the son's fate, including the ride through the steppe, encounter with wild asses and subsequent tragedy. True to his word, the grim khan fulfilled his promise and silenced the messenger of bad news by pouring the molten lead into the soundholes of the minstrel's komuz.

The same legend is popular in Kazakhstan with reference to the dömbra tradition.

Komuz pieces are the heart of Kyrgyz instrumental music. Although they often have genre names (e.g. kerbez, shingrama, botoi), definition of the genres remains unresolved. A structural approach frequently employed by komuz players is the variation of a small, compact melodic kernel in tempo, dynamics, rhythm, melodic register and the contrast of monophonic and polyphonic texture up to three parts.

4. THE EARLY SOVIET PERIOD. The career of Toktogul Satylganov (1864–1933) exemplifies the transition of a major Kyrgyz artist from pre-Soviet to Soviet times. Exiled to Siberia in 1898 because of his political beliefs, Toktogul became a firm supporter of emerging Soviet Kirghizia after the October Revolution of 1917. He is cited as being the most versatile and outstanding performer of the transition period; many of the celebrated folksingers and instrumentalists of later decades were his pupils.

The early Soviet years were marked by intensive collecting of traditional Kyrgyz music, notably by A. Zatayevich, whose anthology (1934, 2/1971) remains the principal collection. Kyrgyz-Russian collaboration in the composition of music in European genres (such as opera, symphony and chamber music) also began in the 1930s. Vocal polyphony was developed initially by analogy with the polyphonic instrumental styles of the komuz and kiak; the latter instruments were remodelled to play in orchestras of folk instruments. Today the Kyrgyz Philharmonia presents concerts in a wide variety of styles, ranging from that of traditional storytellers and minstrels to arrangements of folksongs and major concertos for komuz, as well as Westernized popular songs.

5. OPERA, BALLET, ORCHESTRAL AND CHAMBER MUSIC. There was no professional art music before 1917, and little before the crucial period of 1932–41. In 1936, the Musical Drama Theatre (restyled an opera house in 1942) and the Philharmonic Society were founded; the Union of Composers and Musicologists was established three years later.

In 1939 three composers, Abdïlas Maldïbayev, V.A. Vlasov and V.G. Fere, collaborated on the first Kyrghyz opera, Aychurek ('The Moon Beauty'), based on a Kyrghyz epic. All three had previously worked in 'musical drama', a specific creation of the Soviet period based on traditional musical genres, such as epics, musically and politically reworked. Vlasov and Fere went on to produce the first Kyrghyz ballet, Anar (1940), and the opera Manas (1946), which joined Aychurek as an essential part of the Kyrghyz repertory. Other operas include N. Davlesov's Kurmanbek, M. Abdrayev's Before a Storm and Oldjobay and Kishimdjan (1965), A. Amanbayev's Aidar and Aisha (1952) and S. Osmonov's Seyil, and among later ballets are M. Raukhverger's Cholpon (1943), Kaly Moldobasanov's Materinskoye pole ('Mother's Field'), a distinctive fusion of oratorio and dance, and the works of E. Jumabayev.

Orchestral music has its origins in the same period of 1932–41, and was assisted in the early 1950s by a generation of composers trained at the Moscow Conservatory, including T. Ermatov, A. Tuleyev and M. Abdrayev. The orchestral repertory includes Vlasov's Overture on a Kyrghyz Melody, the first symphonies of H. Rakov and Tuleyev, Jumabayev's 'Epic' Symphony and V. Jusev's Viola Concerto. There are string quartets by Amanbayev, Ermatov and S. Aitkeyev, and a set of 24 piano preludes by J. Maldïbayeva. Ceremonial cantatas and oratorios, though often created to order during the Soviet era, have held their place. Other composers include A. Jumakmatov, B. Feferman and J. Kanimetov.

Kyrghyz musicians, trained in the former Soviet Union, perform in the State Opera and Ballet Theatre (founded in 1955 and named after Maldïbayev in 1978) and the State Philharmonia (named after the traditional musician Toktogul Satïlganov), which has two concert halls. There is a State Academic SO and a chamber chorus run by the broadcasting company.

The first music school, providing specialist instruction at secondary level, was in Frunze (Bishkek); similar institutions later opened in Osh and Karakol. Higher education is provided at the State Institute of Art, founded in 1967, and the National State Conservatory, which opened in 1993.

Kyriale (Lat.). In the Western Christian Church, a collection of chants for the Ordinary of the Mass, that is, Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Agnus Dei and Ite or Benedicamus; or a book or section of a book containing these chants.

The chants are found in medieval books from the 10th and 11th centuries onwards, usually with troped texts. A group of troped Kyries might be followed by a group of untroped melodies, then troped Glorias, untroped Glorias and so on. Credo and Ite settings appear separately and much less frequently. Different regions preferred different ways of grouping the melodies. Northern French books of the 11th to 14th centuries, which generally lacked other tropes, often placed the Kyrie collection together with the Gloria collection, and the Sanctus collection together with the Agnus collection, on either side of a collection of proses. German books from the 12th century onwards would often pair Kyrie with Gloria, and Sanctus with Agnus; first a series of Kyrie–Gloria pairs would be written, then the Sanctus–Agnus pairs.

The melodies were rarely rubricated and it is often uncertain now for which feast they were intended. The following are among the exceptions: I-Ra 123, ff.190*v*–265*v* (11th century, from Bologna, facs. in PalMus, 1st ser., xviii, 1969), has Proper tropes, Ordinary tropes and proses for each feast in the order in which they would be sung within the service; Md I.16 (12th century, Italian) has rubrics for its Kyrie–Gloria pairs (ff.6*r*–14*v*), Sanctus (ff.77*r*–80*v*) and Agnus (ff.80*v*–82*r*). From the 13th century onwards rubrics are more comprehensive; thus duals from the mid-13th century GB-Mr lat.24 onwards have separate Kyrie, Gloria, Sanctus, Agnus and Ite or Benedicamus collections with rubrics (the latter often taken from Office responsory melismas and named after the melisma text; see NEUMA); the incipits of Kyries and Glorias are entered in several masses in a 13th-century gradual from St Bénigne de Dijon (B-Br II 3824). Several graduals have a marginal text incipit of the Kyrie to be used on a high feast.

The new papal and Franciscan missal of the 13th century grouped the chants in 'cycles' for use on different feasts (see Van Dijk and Walker, 1960, p.328); those cycles are the basis of the current Vatican kyriale. Other sources with cycles include D-Bsb mus.40078 (12th century, Quedlinburg: 4 cycles), Mbs lat.3919 (13th century, Augsburg: 11 cycles; facs. in MGG1, 'Messe', pl.10), DK-Kk S.632 (French: 8 cycles), F-Pa 110 and Pn lat.830 (13th century, from Notre Dame and St Germain-l'Auxérrois, Paris, respectively: 15 cycles). The Cistercians had two cycles (from the 12th century), the Carthusians three, the Dominicans seven.

The name 'kyriale' is a comparatively recent term analogous to graduale (gradual), antiphonale (antiphoner) and so on, and may have been invented for the title-pages of early printed graduals such as that of Francis of Bruges, a Franciscan, whose Graduale secundum morem sancte romane ecclesie, integrum et completum videlicet dominicale sanctuarium commune et cantorinum sive kyriale first appeared in Rome in 1499–1500. The section of the book containing the Ordinary chants has no new heading; it includes three Credo chants: the first is a mensural 'Credo maior', a reworking of the present Vatican melody no.IV (facs. in F. Tack: Der gregorianische Choral, Mw, xii, 1960; Eng. trans., 1960, p.50; cf the setting for two voices in I-Sc H.I.10: see RISM, B/IV/4, 1972, p.1036), followed by a less ornate mensural Credo 'de apostolis' and a non-rhythmic Credo 'de dominica' (Vatican I). Rhythmic chants are not uncommon at this period. For instance, the Missale basiliense printed by Wenssler of Basle in 1488 has a rhythmic Gloria at the end of its Kyrie–Gloria pairs (for the Blessed Virgin), then two rhythmic Credos; a plain Credo and the Sanctus–Agnus pairs are followed by a collection of proses.

Vatican books since the Kyriale seu ordinarium missae of 1905 have also included other minor Ordinary Mass chants: the Asperges antiphons, Gloria tones for the introit and alleluia tones for Eastertide (for introit, offertory and communion).

Kyrie eleison. Acclamation sung in the Latin Mass directly after the introit. The basic text, which is Greek, consists of 'Kyrie eleison' (three times), 'Christe eleison' (three times), 'Kyrie eleison' (three times): 'Lord, have mercy ... Christ, have mercy ... Lord, have mercy ...'. The expression 'kyrie eleison' was widely used as an acclamation in pagan civic and religious ceremonies under the Roman Empire, and continued in Christian usage, becoming fixed in various Christian liturgies from the 6th century onwards. Numerous musical settings are documented from the 10th century on. Since (in more recent practice at least) the text did not change from day to day, the Kyrie is counted a part of the Ordinary of the Mass.

1. SOURCES. Kyrie chants survive in manuscripts of the 10th century onwards; the earliest are from France and Germany, while those of the 11th and 12th centuries include large numbers from other European countries. The catalogue by Landwehr-Melnicki includes 226 items; even so, it is not complete. The whole repertory tends to divide itself between items that have large concordances, hence were widely known and used, and items whose isolated concordances show them to be purely local products. The earliest and best-known melodies – the repertory of the 10th and 11th centuries – are very well represented among the Ordinary chants included in the Liber usualis; Kyries are normally identified by their numbering in this source.

The Liber usualis also identifies Kyrie chants by the incipit of the text formerly used with a given melody (e.g. Lux et origo for Kyrie I). Such texts are commonly called 'tropes' by modern scholars, and are not commonly discussed as integral parts of the Kyrie, on the assumption that being 'tropes' these texts are later additions to originally melismatic chants. The terminology has now been corrected on two points. First, text underlay is not troping, so that the Latin words set to Kyrie melodies are not tropes. Second, quite apart from the Kyrie melodies themselves with their Latin words, there are a few compositions that qualify as Kyrie tropes in the strict sense. They are in quite a different style, consisting of short verbal phrases with their own melodies in antiphon style, and they are used as insertions before phrases of the Kyrie melodies (Bjork). Only these short insertions, not the Latin words referred to by the Liber usualis titles, are to be called Kyrie tropes; it is convenient to refer to the Latin words laid under the melodies by the term 'Kyrie verses' (even though most are in prose, only a few being hexameters and only some later ones using syllable-counted verse). These Latin words conform to the basic form of the nine-fold Kyrie, falling into nine lines or verses, each usually ending 'eleison'. The Latin words appear together with the melodies in the earliest sources (10th century). As with sequences, Kyries are notated in these sources in two forms, once in melismatic notation, with only the Greek words for identification; then again with the Latin words with syllabic notation. The early manuscripts give no indication that the melismatic notation represents an earlier form of composition – nor indeed any firm indication that the melismatic notation represents a melismatic performance. At best, the melismatic notation can be taken as an option in performance, and research has suggested several different ways in which the melismatic and syllabic notations can be used in combination and alternation.

For a number of early Kyries the manuscripts provide alternative sets of words; in some cases an alternative set may match the syllable count exactly; in other cases the alternative set requires modification of the Kyrie melody.

2. Early history. The liturgical use of the expression 'Kyrie eleison', especially in the Greek rite, went far beyond the one occurrence at Mass with which we are most familiar; 'Kyrie eleison' tended to be used as a ubiquitous response to other liturgical items. In western Europe it became associated with the various litanies, and this is in many ways its most characteristic use. The invocations in litanies are typically sung by the deacon, the people responding with some such expression as 'eleison'. Exactly how 'kyrie eleison' came to be an independent item at the beginning of Mass – more precisely, after the entrance cortège reached the altar – has been the subject of extensive research, finally clarified by De Clerck and Baldovin.

So compact is 'Kyrie/eleison' that it invites elaboration in the form of more prolix invocations, comparable to those preserved in numerous Latin litanies from the 8th century on. Precisely such elaborations were mentioned by St Gregory in his famous letter: 'In daily masses, moreover, we do not say the other things usually said, but only 'Kyrie eleison' and 'Christe eleison', in order that we may concern ourselves with these supplications at greater length'. Gregory further said that in the Roman rite 'Christe' was said as many times as 'Kyrie'; but at that time, and for a century or two thereafter, the total number of petitions was not yet fixed. Ordo romanus I (?7th century) leaves the number of invocations up to the pontiff, while Ordo IV ('St Amand', early ?9th century) says that nine petitions shall be sung, at which time the pontiff shall give the signal to stop – an obviously redundant and now vestigial signal.

Latin texts tend to be provided for festal occasions, in some cases bordering on the function of a 'proper' text. Simple Kyries were intended in the 11th century for simple occasions, when, as Gregory said in the 6th century, the 'other things usually said' were omitted. Another possible application of Gregory's comment is to assume that a more elaborate Kyrie could be sung on feast days with its Latin text, on lesser occasions without it. Still another is to imagine that each of the nine petitions was sung twice, first with, then without its Latin text, as a reminiscence of the 18-fold antiphonal practice prescribed for festal occasions in Ordo romanus XV.

3. Early melodies. Documents of the 10th century provide composed Kyries with Latin texts for major feasts in the ninefold shape, so that by that time the number of petitions was definitely fixed. In general both texts and melodies of this early repertory seem to be the product of Frankish monasteries. Many early Kyries are of a musical complexity that suggest performance by a schola, not by the whole congregation. There are, admittedly, simple Kyries, and one or the other of these might represent an earlier congregational use (as shown by John Boe in his studies of Kyries in Italian – Beneventan – sources).

More likely, the 10th- and 11th-century repertory includes reminiscences of earlier (pre-Carolingian) practice rather than integral melodies. Such stylized reminiscences of earlier functions can most easily be imagined in the 'eleison'. In some Kyries, for example Kyrie IV (Cunctipotens genitor), the syllable 'e-(leison)' has a neume of several notes, as opposed to the mostly syllabic relationship in the preceding invocation with its Latin text. Even assuming the Latin text to be underlay, it would still be striking that the whole 'melisma' was not texted, but only the part preceding 'eleison'. In this and other ways the 'eleison' is often set off from what precedes, as if it were functionally a distinct part, reflecting the earlier division into the solo invocation and the people's response. Sometimes, as in Kyrie Rex genitor (Liber usualis VI), each of the nine 'eleison' settings is identical, again suggesting a response, although such 'homeoteleuton' could be explained on other grounds (it occurs in sequences for purely musical reasons). Usually the 'eleison' is varied, but variation occurs in other litanies too. The falling-3rd cadence on 'eleison' in Kyrie Fons bonitatis (Kyrie II) and elsewhere might be considered a reminiscence of the kind of recitation tone that was perhaps associated with a litany.

Ordo romanus I tells us that the Kyrie was sung until the pontiff signalled the prior of the schola to stop. In the Kyrie from the Mass for the Dead we might see a way in which the prior would indicate to the rest of the schola that the Kyries should end: all phrases save the last begin alike; the last begins abruptly with a different motif, as if the prior, singing the invocations, broke in at that point with a different melodic motif to signal that this was the last time around.

Many Kyries, early and late, have a phrase repetition within the invocation of the last Kyrie. This kind of repetition could have been at one time another means of signalling the choir (although here again the same repeated phrase structure occurs in sequences within certain couplets for the purely musical purpose of marking the climax of the melody). None of this is to be taken as argument that individual Kyries go back to the 7th or 8th centuries, only that Kyries composed in the 9th and 10th centuries might well recall, deliberately and in stylized manner, an earlier practice.

The establishment of the ninefold shape seems to have been the work of the Franks and their preoccupation with order; from that time on, the large tripartite division remained a basic feature of Kyrie construction (most visible in Kyries with the form AAABBBCCC), and has been used as such by modern scholars in analysing Kyrie chants. Yet the litany ingredient remained strong in the Kyrie, engendering other modes of construction that cut across the tripartite division while being no less characteristic of Frankish craft. A series of litanies has no inherent sectional structure: it goes on endlessly, perhaps rising in intensity, but not falling naturally into larger groupings unless these are imposed from outside. Many of the early Kyrie melodies show an overall ascent in pitch from start to finish; often 'Christe', and even more often the following 'Kyrie', attack a higher pitch. The Kyrie ad libitum VI, favoured for high feasts in the 10th century, shows the ascent most dramatically.

Here as elsewhere, however, the overall ascent does not proceed directly, but rather through a series of alternations: successive petitions are higher or lower, or the melodic material is arranged in some such pattern as ABACBCDCD (Conditor kyrie omnium, ad libitum V). In some respects this pattern shows an enthusiasm for interlocking musical construction comparable with northern interlace patterns in graphic arts, and as such would not be due directly to a litany model; but such interlocking design always tends to obliterate a sectional structure, thus creating the continuity characteristic of litanies (in a very artful way), and might even imitate some kind of antiphonal performance.

The most important segment of the repertory – the Kyries in widespread use during the 10th and 12th centuries – show a remarkable wealth of melodic invention and organization. There are occasional borrowings of phrases from one piece to another, and (as in other medieval categories in the process of creation and development) much reworking of individual pieces through a long series of variants. Nonetheless, the individual work is clearly perceptible in its artistic integrity, exhibiting a carefully wrought plan and detail. Most characteristic, perhaps, is the development of motivic material (sometimes of great expressiveness) to bind the ninefold shape together.

Kyrton (fl 1545). English composer. He is known only for an organ setting of the antiphon Miserere in the earliest section of GB-Lbl Add.29996 (ed. in EECM, vi, 1966). Curiously, it was recopied; the second copy appears at the head of the manuscript in its present state.

Kyrylina, Iryna Yakovlevna (b Dresden, 23 March 1955). Ukrainian composer. She graduated from Dremlyuga's class at the Kiev Conservatory in 1977. Her work follows two distinct directions, namely variety and concert music. Among the first in Ukraine to write cycles for voice and orchestra, she has been influenced by Stravinsky's Pribautki, Ukrainian song, variety music and the post-Webern avant garde, and has produced works notable for the freshness of emotion and diversity of genre. The delicacy of her orchestral writing reflects her essential identity as a miniaturist who is drawn to chamber forces and the conception of sound in terms of resonance. Her popularity as a composer for the variety stage is established in the Ukraine and abroad; the attractive melodic qualities of her well-known songs are in many ways apparent in her more complex concert works, although it is only one of the areas which the two sides of her work share in common.

Kyurkchiyski, Krasimir (b Troyan, 22 July 1936). Bulgarian composer. He studied composition with Vladigerov at the Bulgarian State Conservatory, graduating in 1962, and with Shostakovich at the Moscow State Conservatory. Later he worked as conductor of the Filip Kutev State Folksong and Dance Company and the Folksong Ensemble of the Bulgarian Committee for Television and Radio, then taught score reading at the conservatory before becoming a freelance composer. In 1966 his String Quartet took first prize at the Semaines Musicales Internationales de Paris. Kyurkchiyski's output covers a broad range of genres. It includes two operas written in an accessible and traditional style, and songs, for instance Kalimanku Denku and A Little Bird Sang, which are treasured in Bulgarian musical culture. The expressive and romantic tension in his works show a close identification with Vladigerov's style, and his musical language owes much to the folk music of the Shopski area around Sofia. His music is characterized by so-called Shopski diaphony (singing in two parts), an improvisational quality and by compelling folk-like ornamentation.

He studied at the music school in Poltava (1962–6) and then at the Kiev Conservatory, graduating in 1971 from the composition class of Miroslav Skorik. For a while he taught in the music school of Uman' (1917–2) before moving to Kiev, where he taught at the music school (1974–6) and worked as an editor at the publishers Muzychna Ukraïna (1977–80). A member of the administrative bodies of the Ukrainian Union of Composers, he is a laureate of the N. Ostrovsky Prize (1979) and an Honoured Representative of the Arts of Ukraine (1986). He is drawn in particular towards chamber music; his natural lyricism – notable for its poetry, sincerity and refinement – is prominent in his cantatas for voice and chamber orchestra. His musical language combines turns of phrase from folklore, impressionistic colouring and features of neo-romanticism.

Laade, Wolfgang (b Zeitz, 13 Jan 1925). German ethnomusicologist. After studying composition with Boris Blacher at the Musikhochschule in West Berlin (1947–53), he studied ethnomusicology (with Kurt Reinhard) and anthropology (with Hans Nevermann and Sigrid Westphal-Hellbusch) at the Freie Universität, Berlin. In 1960 he took the doctorate with a dissertation on Corsican lament melodies. He was a research fellow at the Australian Institute of Aboriginal Studies (1963–6) and the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (1967–70) and from 1968 he taught ethnomusicology at Heidelberg University. He was appointed professor of ethnomusicology at Zürich University in 1971. He retired in 1990. He was awarded the Sigillo d'Oro from the Istituto Internazionale de Etnostoria and was made an honorary life member of the European Seminar in Ethnomusicology.

Laade's work has been concentrated on the regions Corsica and Tunisia as well as Australia, Papua New Guinea, Melanesia, Sri Lanka, India and Taiwan. His writings are concerned chiefly with myths, folk tales and legends along with their related music in oral traditions and the interdisciplinary reading of 'meaning' in musical structures and other art forms. He has also examined the local histories of diverse ethnic groups in regard to their migration patterns.

Laban, Rudolf von (b Pozsony [now Bratislava], 15 Dec 1879; d Weybridge, 1 July 1958). Hungarian dancer, choreographer and inventor of a system of dance notation. The son of a general, he was intended for a military career but in 1900 went to study at the Ecole des Beaux Arts in Paris. He became a dancer at the Moulin Rouge, toured North Africa in a revue, and later danced in Leipzig, Dresden, Münster and, in 1907–10, Vienna. In 1910 he opened a school of modern dance in Munich. He worked in Zürich during World War I and in 1919 went to Stuttgart; there he started the Laban Dance Theatre at which Kurt Jooss joined him as a pupil, accompanying him to Mannheim in 1921–3. Laban was ballet director in Hamburg from 1923 to 1925 and founded a Choreographic Institute in Wurzburg in 1926. From 1930 to 1934 he was ballet director of the Berlin Staatsoper. In 1928 he published the first volume of Schifttanz, presenting his system of movement notation, Kinetography Laban, which crystallized many years of thought on the anatomy of movement. For the 1936 Berlin Olympics Laban prepared an open-air performance of 1000 dancers and singers, similar to one that he had produced in Vienna in 1929, but Goebbels banned the performance. In 1937 Laban went to England, joining Jooss and his company at Dartington; during World War II and until 1951 he worked in Manchester, applying his analysis of movement to the uses of industry, and presenting his findings in Effort (1947, with F.C. Lawrence). In 1953 Laban moved to Addlestone, Surrey, where his former associate Lisa Ullmann had founded an Art of Movement School, and he worked there until his death. He published his Principles of Dance and Movement Notation in 1954, by which time his system of dance notation was widely accepted; in 1953 it was renamed Labanotation by the Dance Notation Bureau in New York. The music staves run vertically up the left of the page, and a three-staff column with printed symbols for the choregraphy runs alongside it; it is read from the bottom upwards (see illustration). Laban choreographed many ballets danced in the free, plastic style of modern dance, but none survives.

G.B.L. WILSON

La Barbara [née Lotz; Subotnick], Joan (b Philadelphia, 8 June 1947). American composer and vocal performer. She studied singing at Syracuse University with Helen Boatwright (1965–8) and music education at New York University (BS 1970), and received additional vocal coaching from Curtin at the Berkshire Music Center and from Marion Szekely-Freschl in New York. In 1971 she made her début as a vocalist at the Town Hall, New York, with Steve Reich and Musicians, with whom she continued to perform until 1974; from 1973 to 1976 she also worked with Philip Glass, perfecting the extended vocal techniques by which she would become internationally known and developing her own compositional style. In 1979 she was composer-in-residence in West Berlin under the aegis of the Deutscher akademischer Austauschdienst. From 1981 to 1986 she taught singing and composition at the California Institute of the Arts, and in 1997 joined the staff of the College of Santa Fe. A champion of contemporary music, La Barbara has been active also as a writer and as radio commentator; from 1977 to 1987 she was contributing editor of High Fidelity/Musical America. In 1979 she married the composer Morton Subotnick.

La Barbara has developed her performance skills to a high degree, mastering such vocal techniques as multiphonics, circular breathing, ululation and glottal clicks, all of which have become her signature sounds. Singularly influential, she has given numerous first performances of works written especially for her by American composers such as Ashley, Cage, Dodge, Feldman and Lentz. In 1993 she appeared in the New York première of Subotnick's opera Jacob's Room, and in 1994 in the title role in the New York première of Ashley's quartet of operas Now Eleanor's Idea, as well as in the Florida Grand Opera première of his Balseros. La Barbara has been active also in film as both a composer and performer.

Her compositions, often incorporating electronics, effectively exploit her extraordinary vocal abilities, and for this reason are rarely performed by others. Her 73 Poems (1993), originally a tape work for multi-track voices (and tape) but revised as a performance piece, is a cornucopia of lush vocal effects which are meticulously coupled with Kenneth Goldsmith's nested, fragmented texts. In addition to her own work, La Barbara has produced and recorded works by Cage and Feldman and recorded with jazz artists Jim Hall, Hubert Laws and Enrico Rava; she has collaborated on interdisciplinary projects with both literary and visual artists, and in 1977 worked with Merce Cunningham's Dance Company.

LAURA KUHN

La Barre [Chabanceau de la Barre]. French family of musicians. They were active mainly at the French court from the late 16th century to the early 18th. Many court records give their name as Chabanceau de la Barre; it seems likely that their name was originally Chabanceau but that they later adopted, and preferred to be known by, the name De La Barre.

The earliest recorded musician in the family is the organist Pierre (i), who is first mentioned as an organist in Paris in 1567 and who died on 12 January 1600. Four sons of his first marriage – Claude, Pierre (ii), Jehan and Germain – became musicians. The only child of his second marriage to do so was (1) Pierre (iii). Except for the son of Pierre (ii), Pierre (iv), and Germain's eldest child, Sébastien, all the musicians of the third generation of La Barres were children of (1) Pierre (iii): Charles Henry, (2) Anne, Benjamin, (3) Joseph and (4) Pierre (v).

A 'Monsr de la Barre organiste', who cannot otherwise be identified, copied 11 manuscripts of French music (US-BEm), one containing two solo motets by him (one dated 1718), and another an air à boire. Curtis speculated that this La Barre composed some of the numerous airs printed in various 18th-century collections that are generally attributed to MICHEL DE LA BARRE.

According to Gustafson, there may have been yet another musician named La Barre, possibly resident in England during the 17th century. Keyboard music attributable to him – much of it perhaps transcribed from original lute versions – appears in numerous manuscripts (D-Bsb, ed. in L'organiste liturgique, lviii–lix (Paris, 1967); DK-Kk, ed. A. Dickinson, Keyboard Tablatures of the Mid-Seventeenth Century in the Royal Library, Copenhagen (diss., North Texas State U., 1973); E-Mn 1360; F-Pc Rés.1185; GB-Lbl, ed. in CEKM, xix (1971); Och, ed. in L'organiste liturgique, xviii (Paris, 1957); I-Rvat, ed. in CEKM, xxxii (1968); NL-Uim q-1; S-Uu Ihre 284; US-NYp Drexel 5609 and 5611; and in a private collection), as well as in John Playford's Musicks Hand-Maide (RISM 1663[7]) (for full details see Gustafson). Gustafson has noted that 'the La Barre puzzle remains one of the greatest confusions in the study of 17th-century French harpsichord music'. Finally, a 'Minuet di Monsu Labarra' for violin appears in an Italian household manuscript dating from *c*1640–80 (I-Bc 360), but Gustafson thinks it is not the work of the 'English La Barre' who is found in an Italian keyboard manuscript of the period (I-Rvat).

(1) Pierre de la Barre (iii) (b Paris, bap. 27 Jan 1592; d Paris, bur. 31 March 1656). Keyboard player and composer, son of Pierre de la Barre (i). He had become established as an organist by 1611 and was attached to the king's chamber by 1614. By 1627 he had also become organist of the royal chapel and maître joueur d'épinette to the king and by 1630 organist to the queen, whom he later served as spinet player too. Both Mersenne and Gouy (see Prod'homme) praised his excellent spinet, harpsichord and organ playing, and Mersenne printed portions of his diminutions on a chanson by Louis XIII as an example of what the 'cleverest and quickest hands are able to execute' on the organ. Highly knowledgeable about musical instruments as well, La Barre wrote to Constantijn Huygens, with whom he conducted a sustained correspondence, that he had invented a device 'to make the keyboards [of the harpsichord] move for playing in all sorts of tones and semitones'. Before 1650 he established in his house concerts of sacred music, in which important musicians of the time as well as three of his own children – Charles Henry, (2) Anne and (3) Joseph – took part.

He was a composer of some merit, who according to Gouy excelled in writing for both instruments and voices; most of his compositions, however, have either disappeared or cannot be positively identified. His airs de violon written for several ballets de cour (*c*1619) are no longer extant. A courante for lute (RISM 1617[26], ed. in Corpus des luthistes français, xvii, Paris, 1974), sometimes ascribed to him, might equally well be by one of his half-brothers, especially Pierre (ii), who was known as a lutenist. Apel maintained that three keyboard courantes, early examples of this genre, found in the Lynar tablature A1 (D-Bsb) probably originated with him, but Gustafson has assigned them to the shadowy 'English' La Barre. Previous attributions of other keyboard dances have also been questioned by Gustafson. A keyboard tablature that according to Mersenne was going to be published by Ballard seems never to have come out.

(2) Anne de la Barre (b Paris, bap. 3 July 1628; d before 7 March 1688). Singer, daughter of (1) Pierre de la Barre (iii). One of the leading singers at the French court, she was praised as early as 1646 by Luigi Rossi for her excellent interpretation of his music. In late 1652 or early 1653 she left for the Swedish court at the invitation of Queen Christina, staying on the way with Huygens at The Hague. She remained in Sweden, where she enjoyed enormous success, until well into 1654. She then went to serve the Queen of Denmark at Copenhagen, returning to France through Kassel in late 1655. Between 1656 and 1664 she sang frequently in court ballets, Italian operas (including Cavalli's Ercole amante) and church music on ceremonial occasions. She also appeared privately before the king in his chamber. When in January 1661 she was in fact appointed ordinaire of the king's chamber music, the announcement of her appointment praised her in terms scarcely equalled in other such documents. By 1667, when she married a bourgeois named Antoine Coquerel, her career seems to have slackened, but she remained in the royal chamber music until she was pensioned in 1686.

(3) Joseph de la Barre (b Paris, bap. 21 May 1633; d before 6 May 1678). Organist and composer, son of (1) Pierre de la Barre (iii). He accompanied his sister, (2) Anne de la Barre, on her northern sojourn and on his father's death succeeded him as organist of the royal chapel. His order of appointment cited both 'his capacity in the composition of music' and 'his dexterity in touching the organ'. Two of the La Barre brothers were active as instrumentalists in court ballets during the late 1650s, and the elder, who seems to have played the harpsichord, was probably either Joseph or Charles Henry. In 1674 Joseph was provided with a benefice, the Benedictine abbey of St Hilaire in the diocese of Carcassonne, and as a result he became known as 'L'abbé de la Barre'.

Most of his 18 two-part airs of 1669 are provided with elaborate doubles. According to the Mercure galant his Dolorosi pensieri, a favourite of the king's, had been circulated by some as a composition of Luigi Rossi. The Bauyn Manuscript (F-Pn) contains five harpsichord dances ascribed to a La Barre without a first name, as well as a 'gigue' assigned to Joseph that is nearly identical with one of the five dances, which is called an allemande. On the basis of stylistic similarity, a second allemande and its twin 'gigue' among these pieces can also be attributed to Joseph. The remaining dances, both courantes, are probably also by him. One of the courantes can also be found in the Parville manuscript (US-BEm), along with seven other dances and a prélude non mesuré signed 'La Barre'; three are also in an important collection copied by Charles Babell (GB-Lbl), while a variant version of the prélude appears in a manuscript that belonged to Mlle de La Pierre.

(4) Pierre de la Barre (v) (b Paris, bap. 18 Oct 1634; d before 18 April 1710). Instrumentalist and composer, youngest child of (1) Pierre de la Barre (iii). He succeeded to his cousin Pierre de la Barre (iv)'s post as lutenist in the royal chamber music in 1658. A versatile musician, he also served the queen as bass viol and spinet player. In 1692 he was named one of nine theorbo masters in Du Pradel's Livre commode, and in July 1697 he was made a nobleman and awarded a coat of arms. He seems to have remained active as a musician at court into 1709, although he became paralysed before making his will on 27 March 1710.

A courante for lute in a manuscript compiled by Vaudry in 1699 (F-B, ed. in Corpus des luthistes français, xvii, Paris, 1974) may be by him; a harpsichord setting also exists (US-NH). Two Italian airs for three voices, now lost, ascribed to 'La Barre C' or 'La Barre le cadet' in Liste de plusieurs opéras italiens (F-V) are his only other known pieces.

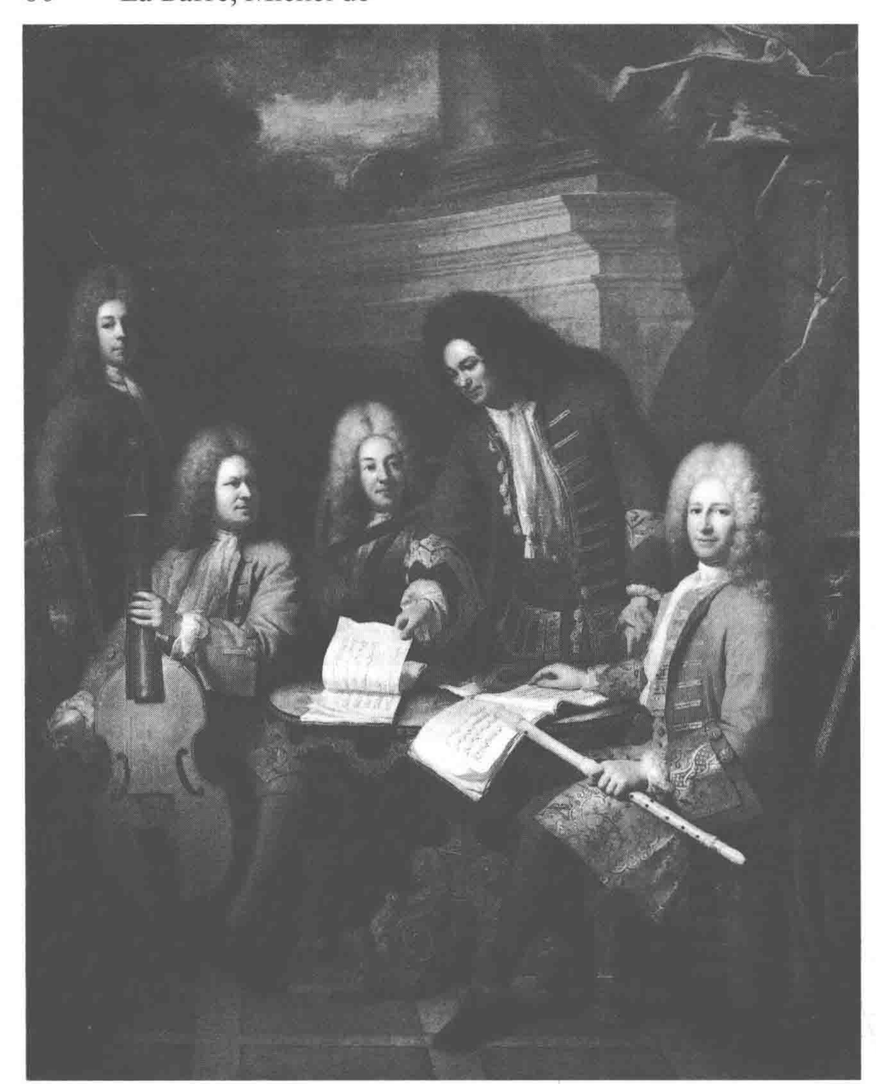
JANE M. BOWERS

La Barre, Michel de (*b c*1675; d 15 March 1745). French composer and flautist. As his first instrumental work, a set of six trio suites for violins, flutes, oboes and continuo, was published in 1694, it seems likely that he was born by *c*1675. The first reference to him as a musician dates from 1699, when the painter André Bouys presented to the Salon nine portraits, one of which was entitled 'M. Labarre, ordinaire de l'Académie de Musique'. In 1700, during the course of a five-month tour of France organized in honour of the dukes of Burgundy and Berry, La Barre travelled to Spain as a player of the 'flûte allemande' for the Count of Ayen. During the same year his opéra-ballet, Le triomphe des arts, was published, and its title-page reveals that he also played at the Académie Royale de Musique. In 1702 La Barre brought out his first book of solo suites for transverse flute and bass, the first solo pieces for flute to appear in print in any country; the titles of several pieces (e.g. L'Espagnol, Le Provençal) relate to the 1700 tour. In May 1704 he took over Antoine Piesche's position in the Musettes et Hautbois de Poitou, and in 1705 the privilege which he received to publish his comédie-ballet La vénitienne shows that he was a flautist in the royal chamber music as well. According to Claude Parfaict, he was regarded as the best flautist of his time, and was particularly celebrated for his very expressive playing.



By 1710, when La Barre brought out his second book of flute solos, he had already published three books of trios, numerous songs, and two suites for two unaccompanied flutes, a genre which he was the first in France to establish and which was to occupy him almost exclusively for the rest of his career. In 1725, when his last extant instrumental work appeared, he was still playing in the royal chamber music, although he had retired from the Académie Royale de Musique by 1721. He resigned from the Musettes et Hautbois de Poitou towards the end of 1730; except for his making a will on 8 March 1741, nothing further is known about his activities until the time of his death.

The preface to his epoch-making first book of solo flute suites describes La Barre's intention of bringing his instrument to perfection, following the model of Marin Marais who had done so much for the perfection of the viol. It also contains the first information in print about slurring and ornamentation on the transverse flute. Most of the suites in this book have eight or nine movements, and each begins with a prelude and allemande pair (fig.1). The other movements include dances of various types, rondeaux, airs and pieces with only names or character titles; they are arranged in no regular order. Most of the solo suites of La Barre's later two books (1710 and 1722) contain only four movements, a reduction that probably came about in response to the Italian sonata style which was sweeping France during the first decade of the 18th century.

La Barre's later duet and trio suites are likewise shorter than the earlier ones. The duets in his ninth book are called sonatas, but apart from the inclusion in one of them of an italianate 3/2 Lentement, they resemble the four-movement suites. La Barre's trio suites are technically less advanced than either his solos or duets. They contain an abundance of short, simple dance movements as well as some slow, pathetic preludes and plaintes. In addition to suites, the third book of trios also includes the first trio sonatas intended solely for transverse flutes and bass to appear in France. They conform to the following plan: slow prelude, fast fugue or gigue, moderate gavotte or rondeau, and fast fugue or gigue. Noteworthy for their contrapuntal emphasis, they exhibit other italianate characteristics as well.

1. Beginning of the first suite from Michel de La Barre's 'Pièces' op.4, from '1er livre de pièces' (Paris, 1710)

2. La Barre and other musicians: group portrait attributed to Robert Tournières or François de Troy, c1710 (National Gallery, London); the music on the table is by Michel de La Barre, and the standing figure is thought to be the composer

La Barre's music for the flute helped make that instrument one of the most fashionable of the time. It also established a flute style that persisted until the middle of the 1720s, most notably in the works of Jacques Hotteterre le Romain. But La Barre's importance also rests upon the actual quality of his work. Though sometimes marred by excessive simplicity, much of it is imaginative, sensitively wrought and full of feeling and spirit. The influence of André Campra is evident in his two opéras-ballets. Neither of them was repeated in its entirety after the year of its initial performance, though Le triomphe des arts was praised by German critics, and many of its melodies were copied into 18th-century manuscript collections. Other airs attributed to 'M. de la Barre' appeared in numerous collections beginning in 1694. Although Curtis has suggested that some of these may have been composed by another La Barre, a 1724 collection devoted exclusively to the flautist's airs à boire definitely establishes his activity in this line of composition.

A group portrait attributed to Robert Tournières or François de Troy belonging to the National Gallery in London is thought to depict the figure of La Barre (fig.2). According to Ecorcheville, the portrait of La Barre by André Bouys, which has been erroneously identified as a portrait of François Couperin, was at the Château de Bussy-Rabute in 1907, and unsigned engravings of it are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

JANE M. BOWERS

Labarre [Berry], Théodore(-François-Joseph) (b Paris, 24 March 1805; d Paris, 9 March 1870). French harpist and composer, foster-brother of Napoleon III. He studied the harp with Bochsa, Cousineau and Nadermann, harmony with Dourlens, counterpoint with Eler and Fétis and composition with Boieldieu. In 1823 he won second prize in the Prix de Rome for his cantata Pyramus et Thisbé and subsequently embarked on concert tours of England, Italy and Switzerland. On his return to France in 1831 he turned his attention to the theatre, writing operas, ballets and incidental music. The musical style of his operas derives from the works of Boieldieu and Adam, and anticipates those of Offenbach; although they never achieved the popularity of Meyerbeer or Halévy, several of his works, such as Jovita, remained in the repertory throughout the 1850s. He also wrote music for the harp as well as romances, some of which became extremely popular (La pauvre négresse was one of Cornélie Falcon's great drawing-room successes). In 1837 Labarre married the singer Mlle Lambert, and from then on spent about an equal amount of time in France and England. He was a conductor at the Opéra-Comique from 1847 to 1849, and later was appointed director of the imperial chapel. He succeeded Antoine Prumier as professor of harp at the Paris Conservatoire (1867–70), where Léon Gatayes and Félix Godefroid were among his pupils. During the last years of his life he was music critic for Paris illustré. He was admitted to the Légion d'Honneur in 1862.

Labaun [Laboun]. Czech family of printers. Jiří Labaun had a printing works in Prague, from about 1686 to 1708 (or perhaps 1713); besides prayers, sermons, calendars, legal and other documents he also printed music by such composers as Holan Rovenský and Wentzely. After his death his son Jiří Ondřej took over the business and continued to publish music, including a new edition of Holan Rovenský's Capella regia musicalis and works by Brentner and Gunther Jakob. After Jiří Ondřej's death his widow continued the business; she printed Černohorský's Laudetur Jesus Christus and Vaňura's Litaniae lauretanae. The printing works, which remained in the Labaun family until about 1769, also produced a series of occasional songs.

ZDENĚK CULKA

L'abbé [Saint-Sévin]. French family of musicians.

(1) L'abbé l'aîné [Pierre-Philippe Saint-Sévin] (b ?Agen, ?*c*1700; d Paris, 15 May 1768). Cellist. While employed as maître de musique at the church of St Caprais in Agen, he took minor orders, thus bequeathing to his family its sobriquet 'L'abbé'. He reached Paris by 1722, where for some years he played cello and provided music for such plays as L'âne d'or (Piron), Les amours déguisés (Fuzelier et al.), and presumably others at the Fair theatres. In 1730 he joined the Opéra orchestra as cellist, soon promoted to the first desk where he remained until pensioned in 1767. He was also a member of the Concert Spirituel orchestra from the 1740s until 1762 and of the musique de la chambre at the French court from about 1753 until his death. With Blavet (flute), J.-B. Forqueray (viol) and Marella (violin) he performed Telemann's 'Paris' quartets at four sessions of the Concert Spirituel in June 1745. He was considered in part responsible for the demise of the bass viol, for Corrette, in his Méthode de violoncelle (Paris, 1741), wrote of 'the happy arrival of the violoncello in Paris through Messrs Batistin Stuck and L'abbé, both virtuosos. At present in the King's Music, at the Opéra, and in concerts, it is the violoncello which plays the basso continuo'.

(2) L'abbé le cadet [Pierre Saint-Sévin] (b ?Agen, ?*c*1710; d Paris, March 1777). Cellist, brother of (1) L'abbé l'aîné. Like his brother, he took minor orders at St Caprais in Agen, and in 1727 joined the cello section of the Paris Opéra, where he was a member of the basses du Petit Choeur until 1767 and the leader of the basses du Grand Choeur from then until pensioned in 1776. He also played at the Sainte-Chapelle from 1764 until 1777.

(3) L'abbé le fils [Joseph-Barnabé Saint-Sévin] (b Agen, 11 June 1727; d Paris, 25 July 1803). Composer and violinist, son of (1) L'abbé l'aîné. A child prodigy, he won a position in the orchestra of the Comédie-Française at the age of 11 in competition with the outstanding violinists Mangean and Branche. This feat brought him to the attention of Jean-Marie Leclair, who gave him lessons between 1740 and 1742. In the latter year L'abbé joined the Paris Opéra orchestra, in which he served for 20 years; he was then denied his pension owing to his youth, even though he had served a full term. His solo début was at the Concert Spirituel in 1741, when he performed a Leclair violin duo with the 13-year-old Gaviniès. More than three dozen solo performances at those concerts until 1754 established him as one of the finest violinists of the mid-18th century. Until the Revolution he lived in semi-retirement, teaching, composing a little, but not performing in public. During the Revolution he lost his fortune, and was forced by necessity to play in the orchestra of the Théâtre de la République et des Arts until feebleness caused his retirement on a tiny pension. He died alone, poor and forgotten.

L'abbé was an accomplished composer. His sonatas, opp.1 and 8, are in the older 'Baroque' style of Leclair, and are among the few works of the period which bear serious comparison with Leclair's sonatas. Two movements of the op.8 sonatas offer relatively rare examples of fully written-out cadenzas. His symphonies, on the contrary, are true symphonies in the modern sense, and among the earliest of the genre to appear in Paris. His collections of airs illustrate the lightening of taste in Paris after 1752 following the impact of the Querelle des Bouffons. The Principes du violon is a treatise of major importance, ranking just behind those of Leopold Mozart and Geminiani as a basic source of information on mid-18th-century violin playing. According to Wirsta (1961), the Principes, among its other virtues, was the earliest violin method to describe pronation, half-position, the modern fashion of holding the violin, the technique of double stops and the application of sons filés and arpeggios to the violin, and was the first publication since Mondonville's prefatory essay to Les sons harmoniques (1738) to discuss the production of harmonics.

NEAL ZASLAW

L'Abbé, Anthony (b Paris, ?1667; d Paris, ?after 1756). French dancing-master and choreographer. In 1698, about ten years after he began dancing at the Paris Opéra, he was brought to London by Thomas Betterton to perform at Lincoln's Inn Fields. He performed and was active as choreographer at various London theatres until at least 1714, and in 1719 he was involved in plans for the new Royal Academy of Music. From 1715 to 1741 he was dancing-master to the grandchildren of George I, with a salary higher than that of Handel, their music master. His extant choreographies, preserved in Beauchamp-Feuillet notation, include a collection of 13 theatrical dances (A New Collection of Dances, London, *c*1725/R) composed during the first two decades of the 18th century; many of them are set to music by Lully and his successors, and are as demanding technically as those by Pécour and other French choreographers.

CAROL G. MARSH

Labbette, Dora [Perli, Lisa] (b Purley, 4 March 1898; d Purley, 3 Sept 1984). English soprano. She studied at the GSM, winning the gold medal, and with Lisa Lehmann on a Melba Scholarship. Boosey's Ballad Concerts and her Wigmore Hall début in 1917 led to a long recital and oratorio career with Beecham, the Hallé, the Promenade Concerts, and the Three Choirs and Delius festivals. She specialized in English songs, especially those of Delius. Her involvement with opera, inspired by Dinh Gilly, began with Mimì at Covent Garden (1935); for her operatic career she assumed the name of Lisa Perli. Her voice was true, pure and youthful, and she was an outstanding actress, ideal for Gounod's heroines, Mélisande, Delius's Vreli (A Village Romeo and Juliet) and Verdi's Desdemona. Her many records include the first complete Messiah and Act 4 of La bohème, both under Beecham. The war cut short her London career in 1939.

ALAN JEFFERSON

La Beausse (fl early 15th century). Ascription at the head of a rhythmically interesting three-voice rondeau, Or voist comme aler en porra, in GB-Ob, Can.misc.213 (ed. in CMM, xi/2, 1959, p.39). The reference may be to a French composer otherwise unknown in the extant musical sources. Two possible names may be suggested for further inquiry: Julian de Boseux, a singer at the court of Charles III of Navarre in about 1400 (Anglès), and, less likely, Johannes de la Bussiere, a young Parisian cleric not qualified as a musician but associated in a 1404 document with two of Benedict XIII's cardinals.

GIULIANO DI BACCO, JOHN NÁDAS

Labèque. French two-piano duo formed by the sisters Katia Labèque (b Hendaye, 3 March 1950) and Marielle Labèque (b Hendaye, 6 March 1952). They received their early training from their mother, Ada Cecchi, a former student of Marguerite Long. At the Paris Conservatoire the two sisters received premiers prix in the class of Lucette Descaves in 1968 and then studied the two-piano repertory in the cycle de perfectionnement with Jean Hubeau. Their international career began after the release of their remarkably colourful and vital recordings of Messiaen's Visions de l'Amen and Bartók's Sonata for two pianos and percussion. They have appeared with major orchestras throughout Europe and the USA and have recorded the concertos for two pianos of Bruch, Mendelssohn, Mozart and Poulenc, as well as much of the standard repertory for piano duet. They have also played a number of new works, including François-Bernard Mâche's Temes Nevinbür, and have given the premières of concertos for two pianos by Luciano Berio and Philippe Boesmans. They are active as ensemble musicians and have performed with Augustin Dumay, Richard Stoltzman and Barbara Hendricks.

CHARLES TIMBRELL

Labey, Marcel (b Le Vésinet, Yvelines, 6 Aug 1875; d Nancy, 25 Nov 1968). French composer and conductor. It was only after studying law to doctorate level that he turned to music, entering the Schola Cantorum to study with Delaborde (piano), Lenormand (harmony) and d'Indy (composition). He was appointed as assistant to d'Indy's orchestral class there (1903–13), and on d'Indy's death in 1931 he became director. He also directed the César Franck School from 1935 and was elected secretary of the Société Nationale de Musique in 1901. Active as a conductor, he directed many orchestral concerts for the Société Nationale (1906–11) as well as pioneering productions of Rameau's Hippolyte et Aricie (1904) and Monteverdi's Orfeo (1911) and L'incoronazione di Poppea (1906). His own music is in a firmly Romantic style, the most notable of his works being the opera Bérangère, produced at Le Havre in 1925.

ANNE GIRARDOT/ANDREW THOMSON

Labi [Larbi], Emmanuel Gyimah (b Accra, 27 Sept 1950). Ghanaian composer. Following musical studies at Achimota School (1964–71) he became a member of the Ghana Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra as a cellist and composer (1971–7). He read music and philosophy at the University of Ghana, Legon (BA 1976), studying composition with Turkson and traditional music as a compositional resource with Nketia, then continued his studies at the University of Illinois (MMus 1979) and the University of Cincinnati Conservatory of Music (DMA 1983). He was a music lecturer at the University of Nigeria, Nsukka (1984–5), Mercy College, New York (1987–8), and the University of Ghana (1988–97). Labi greatly increased and diversified the repertory of the National SO and Chorus while he was its director (1988–97). He has been commissioned by many organizations, including the West Virginia University Center for Black Culture and Research (for Ancient Perspectives no.3, 1993) and the Royal Liverpool PO and Piano Circus (for Gya Nhyira, 1996); his awards include a grant from Meet the Composer (1986). Labi has consistently sought to incorporate indigenous musical materials in his works. His active support of Akin Euba's concept of 'African pianism', in which indigenous musical practices shape the percussive, rhythmic and timbral elements, is clearly evident in Dialects (1986–94). His works are characterized by cross-rhythms, agogic stresses and quartal and extended tertial harmonies. He sometimes uses tonal and rhythmic patterns to highlight the musical practices of a particular people such as the Anlo-Ewe.

DANIEL AVORGBEDOR

Labia, Maria (b Verona, 14 Feb 1880; d Malcesine, Lake Garda, 10 Feb 1953). Italian soprano. She studied with her mother, Cecilia Labia, making her début in 1905 as Mimì in Stockholm. In 1907 she appeared at the Komische Oper, Berlin, as Tosca, returning subsequently as Carmen, Marta (Tiefland) and Salome, among other roles. She sang at the Manhattan Opera House, New York (1908–9), La Scala (1912) and the Paris Opéra (1913). In 1916 she was imprisoned for a year in Ancona as a suspected German agent. Resuming her career after the war, she sang Giorgetta in the first European performance of Il tabarro (1919, Rome), repeating the role in that year in Buenos Aires. In the first Scala production of Wolf-Ferrari's I quattro rusteghi (1922) she played Felice, a role that became her favourite and in which she continued to appear until 1936. Her performances in verismo operas were said to be impulsive and, for their day, 'shamelessly sensual'. She used her warm, not especially large voice with particular reliance on the chest register. Some early recordings remain of her Tosca and Carmen.

Her elder sister Fausta (b Verona, 3 April 1870; d Rome, 6 Oct 1935) had a relatively short career (1892–1912), which included performances as Sieglinde under Toscanini at La Scala. She retired shortly after her marriage to the tenor Emilio Perea.

HAROLD ROSENTHAL/R

Labinsky, Andrey (b Kharkiv, 14/26 July 1871; d Moscow, 8 Aug 1941). Russian tenor. He studied with Stanislaus Gabel at the St Petersburg Academy and sang in the chorus of the Mariinsky Opera. There he made his début as a soloist in 1897, remaining until 1911 and singing in a wide repertory which included Lohengrin and Don José as well as the Russian operatic roles. In 1907 he sang in the première of Rimsky-Korsakov's The Invisible City of Kitezh and undertook a recital tour through eastern Russia to Japan. From 1912 to 1924 he was a leading tenor at the Bol′shoy in Moscow where he appeared in such diverse roles as Radames and Almaviva. In 1920 he was appointed professor at the Moscow Conservatory and at the time of his death was principal vocal coach at the Bol′shoy. His recordings include some brilliant performances and also show him to have been a creative stylist.

J.B. STEANE

Labitzky, Joseph (b Schönfeld [now Krásno], 3 July 1802; d Karlsbad [now Karlovy Vary], 19 Aug 1881). Bohemian violinist, conductor and composer. He was the son of a weaver, who in 1800 moved from Kampern in Prussian Silesia to Schönfeld and in 1802 to Petschau (now Bečov nad Teplou). He studied with Karl Veit and at the age of 14 joined a travelling orchestra in Petschau. In 1820 he obtained a position as violinist in the spa orchestra at Marienbad (now Mariánské Lázně), taking other jobs during the winter months. He played in Munich (1823–4), where he took further violin lessons, and undertook a concert tour of southern Germany, visiting Regensburg, Augsburg, Ulm, Stuttgart, Würzburg and Nuremberg. In 1825 he founded his own orchestra, visiting Vienna in the winter of 1825–6 and Warsaw in 1829–30. In 1835 he became conductor of the spa orchestra at Karlsbad, where he rapidly built up a reputation for himself and his orchestra. His dance compositions began to have widespread popularity, particularly the Paulinen-Walzer op.33 and the Aurora-Walzer op.34. In 1838 he gave concerts in Pilsen (now Plzeň), and in 1839 in Prague, Vienna, Warsaw and St Petersburg (Pavlovsk). He also visited England, and several of his dances have titles with English connotations, including Jubelklänge aus Albion op.70, on the birth of the Princess Royal (1840), and Eduard-Walzer op.82, on the birth of the Prince of Wales (1841). He composed over 300 dances, notable more for rhythmic than melodic appeal. In the latter part of his career he was unable to challenge the supremacy of Gungl and the younger Johann Strauss as a waltz composer.

Labitzky's two sons, Wilhelm (b Petschau, 1829; d Toronto, 1871) and August (b Petschau, 22 Oct 1832; d Reichenhall, Bavaria, 28 Aug 1903) were also violinists, the latter joining his father's orchestra at Karlsbad in 1853 and taking over from him as conductor in 1868. August composed over 50 dances, of which only Der Traum der Sennerin op.45 achieved any wide popularity.

ANDREW LAMB

Lablache, Luigi (b Naples, 6 Dec 1794; d Naples, 23 Jan 1858). Italian bass. The son of an expatriate French merchant and an Irishwoman, he became the most famous bass of his generation. He entered the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini, Naples, at the age of 12, and began his operatic career as a buffo napoletano at the Teatro S Carlino in 1812, making his first appearance in Fioravanti's La molinara. After further study and an engagement as buffo at Messina, in 1813 he became first basso cantante at Palermo, where he remained for several years. His reputation grew, and in 1821 he made a triumphant début at La Scala as Dandini in Rossini's La Cenerentola. He sang at La Scala until 1828, creating Arnoldo in Mercadante's Elisa e Claudio (1821) and Sulemano in Meyerbeer's L'esule di Granata (1822). He also appeared at Rome, Turin, Venice and, in 1824, Vienna, where he was a leading member of Barbaia's company. Ferdinando I of Naples, then in Vienna, appointed Lablache a singer in his royal chapel and had him engaged for the Teatro S Carlo, where for several years he appeared in new operas by Bellini and Donizetti, as well as distinguishing himself in such roles as Assur in Rossini's Semiramide.

On 30 March 1830, Lablache made a brilliant London début as Geronimo in Cimarosa's Il matrimonio segreto at the King's (from 1837 Her Majesty's) Theatre, where he subsequently appeared every season until 1852, except for 1833 and 1834. Lord Mount-Edgcumbe described him on his London début as 'a bass of uncommon force and power. His voice was not only of deeper compass than almost any ever heard, but when he chose, absolutely stentorian, and he was also gigantic in his person; yet when he moderated its extraordinary strength, he sang pleasingly and well'. While his reputation rested chiefly on his interpretation of comic roles, in which he excelled, he was equally impressive in serious roles such as Elmiro in Rossini's Otello, Assur in Semiramide, Henry VIII in Anna Bolena and Oroveso in Norma. In 1839 Wagner wrote an additional aria for this role for him, but Lablache declined to sing it. His Paris début took place on 4 November 1830 at the Théâtre Royal Italien, where he continued to appear regularly until 1851 and created his most important roles, including Sir George Walton in Bellini's I puritani (25 January 1835) and the title role in Donizetti's Marino Faliero (12 March 1835). I puritani enjoyed such success that for the next six years this opera opened and closed each season with its original cast of Giulia Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini and Lablache. In England, Lablache appeared in opera and sang at provincial music festivals and, in 1836 and 1837, was Princess Victoria's singing teacher. He was the first Don Pasquale in Donizetti's opera (Théâtre Royal Italien, 3 January 1843), and his interpretation of this role, in which he displayed 'real comic genius' (Chorley), became definitive (see illustration).

After the opening in 1847 of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, Lablache was one of the few artists to remain faithful to Lumley's management at Her Majesty's (where he created Massimiliano in I masnadieri in 1847). With his readiness to take small roles without condescension he acquired a larger and more varied repertory than any other singer of comparable standing; Lumley described him as 'the greatest dramatic singer of his time'. On the closure of Her Majesty's in 1852 Lablache visited St Petersburg, and in 1854, after his return, he became a leading member of Gye's company at Covent Garden. In 1855, when he was over 60, he was still singing some of his most famous roles, including Leporello, Don Pasquale, Bartolo in Il barbiere and Balthazar in Donizetti's La favorite. His health began to deteriorate in 1856, and he retired from the stage.

Lablache wrote a Méthode de chant which was published in Paris but it added little to his reputation. His eldest son, Federico Lablache, was an operatic bass, and his daughter-in-law, Mme Demeric Lablache, sang for many years as a mezzo-soprano with Mapleson's company. One of his daughters, Cecchina, married the pianist Thalberg.

PHILIP ROBINSON/ELIZABETH FORBES

Labor, Josef (b Hořovice, 29 June 1842; d Vienna, 26 April 1924). Bohemian pianist, organist and composer. He studied with Sechter at the Vienna Conservatory. Although blind, he made the most of his considerable gifts and became chamber musician to the King of Hanover in 1863, and teacher to the princesses. After performing in London (1865), Paris and Russia, in 1868 he settled in Vienna, where he devoted himself to teaching and composition. Among his pupils were Julius Bittner, Frank La Forge, Francis Richter (a nephew of Hans Richter), Paul Wittgenstein and Arnold Schoenberg. He edited Biber's violin sonatas for Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich. His compositions include church and vocal music, including a Pater noster for choir and orchestra op.16 (1912), a Konzertstück for piano and orchestra, a violin sonata op.5 (*c*1890), a piano quartet (1894), organ fantasies and piano pieces.

ERIC BLOM/MALCOLM MILLER

La Borde [Delaborde], Jean-Baptiste (Thillaie) [Thillais, Thillaès] de (b Nevers, 9 June 1730; d Colancelle, late Jan 1777). French physical scientist and mathematician. He invented the first known electric-powered musical instrument. On 26 September 1745 he began his novitiate in the Society of Jesus. He taught rhetoric in Amiens around 1755, and passed his third year of novitiate at Rouen in 1762, just at the time of the suppression of the Jesuit order in France. After spending a few years in Poznań, Poland, he served as a priest in Colancelle until his death.

A competent scientist, La Borde shared the intense interest of his times in electricity. His most important publication, Le clavessin électrique, avec une nouvelle théorie du méchanisme et des phénomènes de l'électricité (Paris, 1761), was prompted by his invention of a keyboard instrument powered by a static charge. The 'electric harpsichord' (sometimes confused with the clavecin chromatique of Jean-Benjamin de La Borde) was based on a warning-bell device used in many electrical test set-ups of the period. It had for each pitch two bells, between which hung a clapper. Wires communicated a stored charge to the bells. Depression of the appropriate key grounded one bell while cutting it off from the charge source, so that the clapper struck the charged bell and the grounded bell in rapid alternation until the key was released. By the inventor's own report, the instrument sounded like an organ's tremolo stop, and was moreover a remarkable sight in the dark on account of its production of sparks. Comment in the press was favourable, even admiring, but the instrument never became more than a curiosity. The model built by La Borde is in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

FREDERIC S. MERRITT

La Borde [Laborde], Jean-Benjamin(-François) de (b Paris, 5 Sept 1734; d Paris, 22 July 1794). French composer and writer on music. Born into an aristocratic family, he studied the violin with Dauvergne and composition with Rameau and made a successful début as a stage composer at the age of 14. He entered Louis XV's service in 1762 and during the next 12 years acquired the title of premier valet du chambre and worked primarily as a composer. The majority of his stage works are opéras comiques, but he also wrote pastoral operas, such as Annette et Lubin, La meunière de Gentilly and La cinquantaine. Their short airs, hardly allowing the singers time to express any sentiment, are mostly composed in regular periods, with a string and basso continuo accompaniment, resembling the ariettes or chansons that La Borde published separately in collections with great success. The pastorales convey less a sense of drama than an agreeable lyrical atmosphere.

La Borde's best work is possibly the concisely written, lively Gilles, garçon peintre, z'amoureux-t-et-rival, a parody of Duni's Le peintre amoureux de son modèle; it is characterized by irregular rhythms, continuous dynamic changes, ensembles and unaccompanied airs. He also composed tragédies lyriques that bear witness to his close relationship with Rameau, and he revised operas by Lully and Collasse, documenting his interest in updating the 'classics' of French opera. According to Lajarte, Ismène and Amadis enjoyed 23 performances and La cinquantaine 26 (although the Mercure de France reports that the audience whistled at its première). Some of his operas were performed only privately. Grimm was openly hostile towards him: after the première of Les amours de Gonesse he called him a 'barbouilleur de notes infatigable' (see Tourneux, vi, 302); he frequently found La Borde's music lacking in 'goût' and 'génie' (viii, 200; ix, 237; xi, 162), and labelled him an 'amateur' (vii, 457).

In 1773 La Borde's relationship with the famous dancer Marie-Madeleine Guimard came to an end. After the death of Louis XV in 1774 he lost his position at court. In the same year he married Adelaide de Vismes, sister of the director of the Opéra. During the following 18 years La Borde wrote, edited or translated, partly in collaboration, some 20 books on musical, topographical, historical and literary subjects. They have been severely criticized by 19th-century scholars for their factual inaccuracies and structural shortcomings. Nevertheless, his four-volume Essai sur la musique ancienne et moderne (1780) remains an extremely valuable source of information on 18th-century music, as well as that of earlier periods and its historiography. The Essai was apparently a side-product of La Borde's extensive travels through France, Switzerland and Italy collecting material for his other books, and he was aware of its work-in-progress status at the time of publication. In the Essai La Borde and his collaborators assembled information on the music of many non-European countries, including Samoa and China, and sought to describe the social context in which music was performed. Yet La Borde did not apply a strict historical, systematic or alphabetical organization to the material. He inserted complete compositions by Claude Le Jeune, Lassus, Ronsard and others. On the subject of 18th-century theory and operatic criticism he took Rameau's side against Rousseau and favoured Piccinni at the expense of Gluck. During the Revolution he escaped from Paris; meanwhile his palace, with its library of 25,000 volumes and extensive collection of scores, was burnt down. He was eventually arrested in Rouen, brought back to Paris and guillotined five days before Robespierre's downfall.

Labroca, Mario (b Rome, 22 Nov 1896; d Rome, 1 July 1973). Italian composer, music organizer and critic. He studied with Respighi and G.F. Malipiero, graduating from the Parma Conservatory in 1921, but in his work on behalf of modern music he came closer to Casella. He actively participated in the affairs of the Corporazione delle Nuove Musiche and the Italian section of the ISCM; and he showed the same zeal as director of the music division of the Direzione Generale dello Spettacolo attached to the Ministry of Popular Culture, as well as later in his post as manager of the Teatro Comunale, Florence (Maggio Musicale Fiorentino), 1936–44. He was then artistic director of the Teatro alla Scala, Milan (1947–9), and a director of the music department of Italian radio (1949–58). In 1959 the centre of his activity shifted to Venice, where he helped to organize, among other events, the Venice festivals. In the 1960s he also taught music history at the Università Italiana per Stranieri in Perugia.

Despite his copious activities as a critic, and as a music organizer (documented in his invaluable, partly autobiographical L'usignolo di Boboli), Labroca wrote a fair number of compositions, at least in the earlier part of his career. His style at first followed that of his teacher Malipiero: the Ritmi di marcia and Suite for piano contain unmistakably Malipierian acerbities and luminosities. Malipiero-like, too, is the vivacious First String Quartet, although Labroca's rhythmic and formal methods are more orthodox, less wayward and improvisatory. During the 1920s Labroca was briefly associated with Massarani and Rieti in a group calling itself I Tre, in imitation of Les Six. Unlike Rieti, however, he never revealed obvious French influences in his music. In the 1930s, rather, he showed signs in some works (e.g. the sunny, ebullient Second String Quartet) of continuing to develop in parallel with Malipiero; while in others, like the rather laboured Sonata for orchestra with piano, he moved closer to Casella. These two influences fuse in the Stabat mater, a restrainedly moving personal statement that is probably Labroca's most important composition. Among the few works he wrote after 1940, the Tre cantate sulla Passione turn to a more sombre, chromatic manner; a certain sluggishness, particularly in rhythmic invention, confirms that by 1950 Labroca's creative urge had lost its former compulsiveness.

GUIDO M. GATTI/JOHN C.G. WATERHOUSE

La Bruère, Charles-Antoine Le Clerc de (b Crespy-en-Valois, 1714; d Rome, 18 Sept 1754). French librettist. An amateur of noble birth, he began his literary career with the comedy Les mécontents (1734). From 1744 to 1750 he held the privilege (jointly with Louis Fuzelier) of the Mercure de France, to which he contributed. He was eventually appointed first secretary to the Duke of Nivernois; when the duke became French Ambassador to the Papal Court in 1749 La Bruère followed him to Rome, where he remained until his death.

La Bruère had a gift for writing elegant and memorable verse. Voltaire praised the libretto of Les voyages de l'Amour as 'plein de grâces & d'esprit' (letter to Berger, 5 April 1736) and other contemporaries, including D'Alembert, quoted passages from Dardanus with genuine admiration. La Bruère was less secure in his treatment of the plot. The original libretto of Dardanus has been described, justly, as 'without contradiction the most inept' in the history of the genre (Girdlestone, 1972). Even by contemporary French standards it is overcharged with supernatural elements. For the first revival, in 1744, La Bruère made extensive changes, so that Acts 3, 4 and 5 had an entirely new plot. In his lifetime this version excited remarkably little comment; but when the work was revived in 1760 it had come to be regarded as one of French opera's chief glories.

Of La Bruère's other librettos, only the one-act Bacchus et Erigone had any lasting success. It was written for Mme de Pompadour's Théâtre des Petits Cabinets (the marquise herself played Erigone), and later incorporated into the opéra-ballet Les fêtes de Paphos (1758).

Labunski, Felix [Łabuński, Feliks Roderyk] (b Ksawerynów, 23 Dec 1892; d Cincinnati, 28 April 1979). American composer and teacher of Polish origin. At first, in St Petersburg, he was a student of architecture. He then studied with Marczewski (theory) and Maliszewski (composition) at the Warsaw Conservatory (1921–4) and with Migot (musicology), Boulanger (composition) and Dukas (orchestration) at the Ecole Normale de Musique, Paris (1924–30). In 1926 he was a founding member (later serving as secretary, then chairman) of the Association of Young Polish Composers in Paris. In 1934 he returned to Poland and became director of music at Polish Radio, a post he held until 1936, when he moved to the USA (he took American citizenship in 1941). In 1940–41 he lectured in counterpoint and composition at Marymount College in Tarrytown (New York), and from 1945 to 1964 he was professor of composition and orchestration at the Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music. He appeared as a pianist, mostly performing his own compositions, and was also active as a writer and critic; he contributed to Modern Music and Musical America and made about 100 programmes for CBC and NBC. He received an honorary doctorate from the Chicago Music College in 1951 and an award from ASCAP in 1977.

In his compositions Labunski paid great attention to musical form, creating a successful balance between unity and diversity. His music is characterized by colourful instrumentation and intensity of feeling. He was influenced by Hindemith, Falla and Stravinsky, and by Polish folk music when creating his own synthetic scales. In Poland his works are little known.

Lacassagne [La Cassagne; de La Cassagne], Joseph (b Ile d'Oléron, Charente-Maritime, *c*1720; d ?Paris, *c*1780). French theorist and teacher. He studied at the cathedral school in Marseilles, and later taught music there. He then entered the priesthood and lived in Paris, where his patrons included the dauphin and his wife, Marie Antoinette. His Traité général des élémens du chant (Paris, 1766/R), intended for beginners, is his most noteworthy publication. In it he proposed to simplify the reading of music by using only one clef (a movable G clef) and only three time signatures: 2, for simple duple metre; 3, for simple triple metre; and 2/3 for compound metre with ternary subdivisions. His supplementary L'uni-cléfier musical (Paris, 1768) was a response to Pascal Boyer's publication attacking the Traité général. Though his proposals caused some controversy they found little favour. He also wrote a Recueil de fables mises en musique for unaccompanied voice (1754) and an Alphabet musical, ou Gamme de la musique (1765), and contributed an air to the Mercure de France (1773).

ALBERT COHEN

Lacépède, Bernard Germain Etienne Médard de la Ville-sur-Illon, Comte de (b Agen, 26 Dec 1756; d Epinay-sur-Seine, 6 Oct 1825). French naturalist, theorist and composer. He studied performance and composition at Agen and Bordeaux, and from 1775 corresponded with D'Alembert on matters of theory. Having written to Buffon and Gluck, he was cordially received by both in Paris in 1777. Gluck had just composed Armide, and despite his encouragement Lacépède destroyed his own setting of this text. For a short time he attempted parallel careers in science and music, reaching eminence in the former as Buffon's successor and as director of the Jardin des Plantes; he published on the natural history of mammals, including whales and humans. He took lessons from Gossec and in 1783 his Omphale was accepted and rehearsed at the Opéra; the caprice of the leading singer, St Huberty, caused it to be withdrawn, and Lacépède confined his remaining dramatic and instrumental music to private performance. His Poétique de la musique (1785) offered an unusually serious discussion of instrumental music. He owed something to the Encyclopedist theory of imitation, and the influence of Gluck is apparent in his emphasis on the dramatic, rather than pleasurable, function of music in the theatre. His descriptive instrumental music to Fénelon's Télémaque was intended to illustrate his ideas.

GUY BOURLIGUEUX

Lacerda, Osvaldo (Costa de) (b São Paulo, 23 March 1927). Brazilian composer and teacher. In his native city he studied piano with José Kliass and harmony with Ernesto Kierski (1945–7). He received his training in composition under Camargo Guarnieri (1952–62). A Guggenheim Foundation Fellowship took him in 1963 to the USA, where he studied for a year with Vittorio Giannini in New York and Copland in Tanglewood. In 1965 he participated in the Inter-American Composers Seminar held at Indiana University, and in the Third Inter-American Music Festival in Washington, DC. Actively engaged in teaching, he became a professor at the Escola Municipal de Música (São Paulo) in 1969; he has served as president of the Sociedade Pró Música Brasileira (1961–6), the Comissão Estadual de Música de São Paulo (1967), and from 1985 the Centre for Brazilian Music in São Paulo. He was an active participant in the National Commission for Sacred Music (1966–70); in 1972 he was elected a member of the Academia Brasileira de Música. In 1996 he was one of about 20 composers selected to participate in Sonidos de las Américas, a festival in New York sponsored by the American Composers Orchestra.

Lacerda's music incorporates a subtle national idiom into a modern harmonic context. His intimate knowledge of Brazilian popular and folk music is best shown in the ten Ponteios for piano solo and the twelve suites under the title Brasiliana in which features of folksong and dance (such as modinha, lundu, desafio, marcha-de-rancho) are used. His Variations and Fugue (1962) is based on the three main motifs of a Brazilian nursery rhyme. However, the original theme undergoes such drastic modifications as to become unrecognizable. Lacerda's best known orchestral piece is the clearly nationalist suite Piratininga (1962), which won him first prize in the Brazilian National Composition Competition of the same year. In the 1970s and 80s Lacerda applied an increasingly sophisticated technique to his early nationalist aesthetic; during this prolific phase he composed numerous solo songs, piano works and chamber music.

Lach, Robert (b Vienna, 29 Jan 1874; d Salzburg, 11 Sept 1958). Austrian musicologist and composer. He read law at the University of Vienna but worked in Austrian provincial administration from 1894 to 1904 before completing his degree. At the same time he studied composition with Robert Fuchs at the Conservatory of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna (1893–9) and musicology with Wallaschek, Rietsch and Adler (1896–9).

He obtained the doctorate in 1902 from the German University in Prague with a dissertation on the development of ornamented melody. He lived for the next few years in the south in Istria, Dalmatia and Italy owing to ill health and was pensioned from government service in 1904, at which point he dedicated himself to musicological writings and opera composition. He returned to Vienna and in 1911 began working in the Hofbibliothek, succeeding Ferdinand Scherber as director of the music collection (1912–20). He was awarded the Habilitation at the University of Vienna in 1915 by virtue of the publication of his doctoral dissertation and received a commission from the Akademie der Wissenschaften to record the songs of Russian prisoners of war (1916–17). He became a reader at the University of Vienna in 1920, succeeding Wallaschek, and was professor from 1927 until his retirement in 1939. From 1924 he was also professor of music history, philosophy and music aesthetics at the Vienna State Academy. In 1954 he became general editor of the new Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich.

Lach's importance was as an ethnomusicologist who, with a broad, systematic approach, attempted to explain the genesis of man's music in biological, physiological and psychological terms, an approach exemplified in his doctoral thesis. Despite his strong German nationalism and early entry into the Nazi party, he was a harsh critic of the attempted application of racial theory to musicology. His ethnomusicological studies spilt over into general music history, where he had wide interests and a sound background as a music librarian (he carried on Mantuani's work in cataloguing the collection of music manuscripts in the Vienna National Library). Active as an orientologist, philosopher and aesthetician, he was also a poet and a very prolific composer. Many of his songs have been published but the majority of his works, including eight masses, ten symphonies, eight string sextets, 14 string quintets, 25 string quartets and other chamber and stage music, remain unpublished.

Lachartre, Nicole (b Paris, 27 Feb 1934; d Versailles, 25 Jan 1992). French composer. She studied composition with Milhaud, Rivier and Jolivet at the Paris Conservatoire, where she received premiers prix in fugue and counterpoint. From 1966 to 1967 she undertook electro-acoustic research at the Groupe de Recherches Musicales in Paris, work which she later continued at studios in Stockholm, Utrecht, Ghent and Bourges. In 1974 she founded the Association pour la Collaboration des Interprètes et des Compositeurs to encourage the commissioning of new compositions and a closer working relationship between performers and composers. Towards the end of her life she became interested in Japanese culture. Her music is conceived as a spiritual experience and seeks to communicate an inner intensity, calling variously upon traditional methods, electro-acoustics and mathematical techniques. Some of Lachartre's works involve what she terms 'musivision', an interaction of musical and visual worlds.

FRANÇOISE ANDRIEUX/JAMES R. BRISCOE

Lachenet, Didier. See LESCHENET, DIDIER.

Lachenmann, Helmut (Friedrich) (b Stuttgart, 27 Nov 1935). German composer. From 1955 to 1958 he attended the Stuttgart Musikhochschule, where he studied theory and counterpoint with Johann Nepomuk David and the piano with Jürgen Uhde. From 1958 to 1960 he studied composition in Venice with Nono, whom he had met in 1957 at the Darmstadt Ferienkurse für Neue Musik. Lachenmann lived in Munich from 1960, and later moved to Stuttgart. Besides his activities as a composer and pianist, he also taught at various institutions during this period. In 1972 he taught composition for a year at the Basle Musikakademie, and from then on his teaching duties frequently took him abroad. In 1976 he was appointed professor of music theory and aural training at the Staatliche Hochschule für Musik und Theater, Hanover, a post he held until 1981, when he took a chair in composition (and, until 1988, music theory) at the Stuttgart Musikhochschule. He was awarded the Ernst von Siemens music prize in 1997.

Only two pieces written during Lachenmann's period of study at the Stuttgart Musikhochschule have found their way into his catalogue of works: the piano cycle Fünf Variationen über ein Thema von Franz Schubert (1956–7) and the Rondo (1957) for two pianos, dedicated to his teacher David. In the Schubert variations Lachenmann does not adopt a Schubertian mode of expression but points up structural aspects of the theme in a way that emphasizes the historical distance between himself and his model and shows the theme in an entirely new light.

The composers of the postwar avant garde whom he met at Darmstadt, Nono especially, exercised a crucial influence on Lachenmann's subsequent development. His study of the works and aesthetics of the serial composers, and the Second Viennese School in particular, left clear traces on his compositions of this period. For instance both the point-like texture of Souvenir (1959) for 41 instruments and the orchestral studies Due Giri (1960) are based on a comprehensive serial organization of the different parameters. Up to the Wiegenmusik (1963) for piano and the String Trio (1965) Lachenmann's work was governed by this concept of sound as the outcome and expression of abstract ideas of order.

In the 1960s two tendencies of fundamental importance to his later work began to emerge: first, as he commented in 1962 in his introductory text to the piano piece Echo Andante, he developed a kind of 'musical thinking in which structure was not the means to expressive ends, but instead expressivity, as a pre-existing factor already inherent in the means, became the point of departure for structural adventures'. Second, and linked to this approach, was his increasing interest in the 'anatomy' of sound, which went further than the purely acoustical considerations central to serial thinking (pitch, duration, dynamics and timbre). Lachenmann now integrated the mechanical and physical conditions of instrumental and vocal sound production into his compositions, and developed the concept of what he has called musique concrète instrumentale, music 'in which the sound events are chosen and organized so that the manner in which they are generated is at least as important as the resultant acoustic qualities themselves. Consequently those qualities, such as timbre, volume, etc., do not produce sounds for their own sake, but describe or denote the concrete situation: listening, you hear the conditions under which a sound- or noise-action is carried out, you hear what materials and energies are involved and what resistance is encountered'.

As a result, after temA (1968) for flute, mezzo-soprano and cello, the overall sound of Lachenmann's works fundamentally changed. Its defining characteristic now, as in almost all the composer's subsequent output, was the exploitation of loud and unconventional sounds more in the nature of noise, of the kind generally suppressed in traditional instrumental performance. For instance in Pression (1969–70) for solo cello, the familiar sound of the instrument is presented as the result of just one of many ways to draw sound from the instrument, ways which also include such techniques as bowing the body and tailpiece of the instrument, or exerting extreme pressure with the bow. Guero (1970) for solo piano entirely avoids the 'normal' sound of the piano achieved by striking the keys. Lachenmann developed a special way of notating these works, which combines elements of traditional notation with a special tablature.

Lachenmann's principal aim in his development of musique concrète instrumentale was not merely to extend the repertory of available sounds along the lines of the discussions of the 1950s and 60s on the concept of musical material, or to shock the listener by the 'alienation' of the familiar sound of the instrument. Instead, the composer's intention was to explore a new sound world and to create compelling and logical musical works based predominantly on sonorities which had remained unused and hence uncontaminated in the past. The musical instrument, as the quintessence of its many sound-generating possibilities, is effectively reinvented in the process. Lachenmann has spoken of composition as equivalent to 'building an instrument', and this is as true of his attitude to solo instruments as it is to his approach to ensembles or orchestras. Serial ideas of order now become available for the musical exploitation of this newly discovered sound world. Lachenmann continued to work with abstract 'structural networks' and 'temporal networks', but they now had only a regulatory rather than a generative function.

Lachenmann's analysis of hitherto unexploited aspects of the 'anatomy of sound' was at first largely confined to the mechanical and physical conditions of its production. A new, uncharted tonal world is now opened up, one in which the expressive qualities seemingly inherent in different sounds do not derive from their use in past music but seem to the listener to be carried over from other, non-musical domains of experience. This notion of musical expressivity as socially mediated did not become central to Lachenmann's work until the mid-1970s, since when, in what has turned out to be the longest phase of his creative development, his interest has focussed on what he calls the 'aesthetic apparatus'. The object of composition is no longer the sound material alone. Instead, the composer's thinking must also include the social contingency of his means of expression and construction. He now no longer has to prove himself by working solely with 'virgin' material, in other words sounds not yet devalued by excessive use, but also (indeed especially) by using the all too familiar sounds of the traditional repertory. Lachenmann seeks to create a new experience out of the worn and outmoded. His direct references back to tradition, increasingly frequent since the mid-1970s, should be seen in this context, for instance in Accanto: Musik für einen Klarinettisten mit Orchester (1975–6), where he refers to Mozart's Clarinet Concerto, and in the orchestral work Staub (1985–7), where the reference is to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The culmination of this most recent phase in the composer's output came with the 1997 première of his 'music with images', Das Mädchen mit den Schwefelhölzern (1990–96). In this, his first stage work, the subject is not merely the projection of the plot of Hans Christian Andersen's fairy tale 'The Little Match Girl' onto the social conditions of our time, but also the institution of opera itself as part of the 'aesthetic apparatus'.

In response to the stereotyped perception of his music as the expression of protest or denial, a cliché that became established at quite an early date, Lachenmann has repeatedly emphasized the novelty and uncontaminated aspect of his sound worlds. His work may indeed strike its listeners initially as a denial of the familiar; in other words, they perceive only what they find lacking from it. However, once they open up to his new and strange world of sound, his work offers the chance of an aesthetic experience largely undistorted by habit: an immediate and thus a liberating experience. This 'existential' dimension of artistic creativity has been at the heart of Lachenmann's poetics of composition since the 1960s. Composition in the here and now is understood in relation to the mechanism of hearing, itself viewed as a network of experiences, expectations and habits. This network is determined by its own historical dynamic. Seen in this way, composing is a social activity, that is to say it intervenes in those social conditions that determine our perception. Some of the force of such a 'social activity' can be felt in the resistance to Lachenmann's music, and the often vehement reactions it has elicited from musicians and the public: the music itself ends up demonstrating the force of habit. The uproar in 1986 over the refusal of the SWF SO to give the première of Staub, a work it commissioned, should be seen against this background.

It is only in this most recent phase of his work that Lachenmann has truly succeeded in establishing the social and ultimately political dimensions of his work, which, while not flouted openly, are genuinely subversive in their aesthetic implications. An approach to composition that is closely connected to a concrete historical situation often ends up locked between the dialectical poles of habituation on the one hand and the disruption of habit on the other. Such would also be the fate of Lachenmann's music if his new sound world did not result in such aesthetically convincing works. Transcending easy and short-lived shock effects, these works construct a world with a beauty of its own, one that reveals itself only after several hearings, and is still not exhausted after many more.

Since the 1960s, in parallel to his development as a composer, Lachenmann has given many lectures, and has written essays and introductions to his works which may be regarded as attempts to make himself understood on unknown and uncertain ground. While the analysis of sound was the focal point of his thinking in the 1960s ('Klangtypen der Neuen Musik', 1966), the changes in Lachenmann's work from the mid-1970s onwards brought the historical aspects of his musical material to the centre of his attention (for instance in 'Vier Grundbestimmungen des Musikhörens', 1979). The majority of his writings since 1966 are published in the volume Musik als existentielle Erfahrung (Wiesbaden, 1996). Lachenmann's growing reputation as one of the major exponents of the postwar avant garde in Germany has also stimulated an increased academic interest in his work, aided by the availability of most of his sketches, scores and working materials in the Paul Sacher Foundation, Basle.

La Chevardière, Louis Balthazard de (b Volx, Feb 1730; d Verrières-le-Buisson, 8 April 1812). French music publisher. Advertisements for musical works in various periodicals in October 1758 mark the start of his activities as a music publisher. He took over the business which JEAN-PANTALÉON LE CLERC had passed on to his daughter Mme Vernadé. By December 1758 La Chevardière referred to himself as the 'successeur de M. Le Clerc'. Huberty seems to have been briefly associated with him in 1759 for both their names appear on the title-page of Philidor's Blaise le savetier ('Paris, de La Chevardière et Huberti, successeurs de M. Leclerc'). Thereafter La Chevardière worked alone until 1780. On 5 February he handed over the management of the shop to his daughter Elisabeth-Eléonore and his son-in-law Jean-Pierre Deroullède for three years; he finally sold the business to Pierre Leduc on 1 December 1784. He then retired to Verrières, where he became mayor of the municipality.

La Chevardière showed great eclecticism in the works he published: both 'fashionable' music (quadrilles, minuets, vaudevilles, rondos, ariettes, songs, and airs from opéras comiques) and more 'serious' compositions (chamber music, symphonies, sacred music) and treatises. Haydn, J.C. Bach, Carl and Anton Stamitz, Toeschi, Cannabich, Locatelli, Boccherini (see illustration), Jommelli, Pergolesi, Gossec, Grétry, Philidor, Duni, Monsigny and La Borde are among the composers represented in his catalogues. La Chevardière was one of the first French publishers to bring out weekly music magazines and most of the symphonies he published were presented in the form of periodical publications.

ANIK DEVRIÈS

Lachmann, Robert (b Berlin, 28 Nov 1892; d Jerusalem, 8 May 1939). German ethnomusicologist. He studied English, French and Arabic at the universities of Berlin and London. His first contact with non-Western (especially Arab) music took place during World War I when he was sent to the Wünsdorf POW camp to collect folklore and traditional music from prisoners; there Lachmann met Arab soldiers and made his first attempts at transcribing their songs. This work was encouraged by Erich von Hornbostel and Curt Sachs, then members of the Berlin Phonogrammarchiv.

After 1918 he studied musicology under Johannes Wolf and Carl Stumpf and Semitic languages under Eugen Mittwoch at Berlin University, taking the doctorate in 1922 with a dissertation on urban music in Tunisia based on his own field recordings. In 1924 he joined the Berlin Staatsbibliothek and studied librarianship. After a year in Kiel (1926) he returned to the Berlin Staatsbibliothek in 1927 to take up a post in the music department under Wolf. Meanwhile he continued to study Near Eastern music, mainly during several recording expeditions in North Africa. In 1925 he visited Tripoli, and in 1926 and 1929 was again in Tunisia recording fellahin and Bedouin music, as well as the song of the Jewish community on the Isle of Djerba.

This experience led to his appointment as head of the Phonogram Commission recording music at the Congress of Arab Music (Cairo, 1932). He selected and recorded performances of the best Arab musicians from Morocco to Iraq. At his instigation the Gesellschaft zur Erforschung der Musik des Orients was founded in 1930, and he edited its quarterly journal, Zeitschrift für vergleichende Musikwissenschaft, throughout the three years of its lifetime (1933–5).

Lachmann, who was Jewish, lost his job at the Berlin Staatsbibliothek under the Nazi government. In 1935, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem invited him to open a Phonogram Archive for Oriental Music. His research during his last four years in Jerusalem (1935–9) marked the start of modern ethnomusicology in Israel. He brought with him his earlier recordings of Arab music (about 500 items recorded in North Africa) and made 1000 more recordings, which brought to light a number of oral liturgies preserved by Middle Eastern Jewish communities in Jerusalem but originating elsewhere. His new recordings also helped to perpetuate the exclusively oral music tradition of some Jewish communities (e.g. the Samaritans) and of some eastern churches. In addition a series of recordings represents the classical art forms of Arab music as known in Iraq and Syria.

In Jerusalem Lachmann tried a new approach to the complexities of Jewish music, and in Jewish Cantillation and Song in the Isle of Djerba (1940) finally evolved a way of describing a community comprehensively through a detailed structural analysis of the recorded materials. His aim was to set the picture of North African Jewish music against the larger background of Islamic music civilizations, thus demonstrating that the music of an independent religious community could be influenced by neighbouring cultures.

Lachmann was one of the finest exponents of the early European school of comparative musicology, stressing comparative analysis of musical forms and their morphological qualities as well as the variants and parallels of one single type (e.g. women's laments, folk epics, ritual songs) around the world. He deepened insight into the worldwide relationships of such basic forms. Another of his achievements was to enlarge the understanding of the intricate forms of ornamental variation and improvisation in Arab music.

EDITH GERSON-KIWI

Lachmund, Carl V(alentine) (b Booneville, MO, 27 March 1853; d New York, 20 Feb 1928). American pianist and teacher. He was a disciple of Liszt. His childhood was spent in Iowa, and when he was 14 his German-born parents sent him to the Cologne Conservatory where he studied with Hiller. Later he went to Berlin where his teachers were Moszkowski and Xaver Scharwenka. By 1880 he was in demand as a chamber player and toured America with the violinist August Wilhelmj.

In spring 1882 he joined Liszt's masterclass in Weimar and studied with the Hungarian master for the next three summers. Lachmund left a detailed account of these classes in a series of personal diaries which identify his fellow students (among them Rosenthal, Friedheim and d'Albert), describe their repertory, and record Liszt's comments on interpretation and piano playing in general. An invaluable source of Lisztiana, these diaries later formed the basis of Lachmund's important book Living with Liszt, completed in the 1920s, but unpublished during his lifetime.

After returning to America, Lachmund settled in New York and opened the Lachmund Piano Conservatory on West 85th Street. The school prospered and remained in existence for 60 years, being directed after his death by his youngest daughter, Marjorie. He also founded and conducted the Women's String Orchestra (possibly one of the first ensembles of its kind), which gave regular concerts in New York. He was active as a composer, writing piano, chamber and orchestral works. His extensive archive of Liszt-related materials is held at the New York Public Library for the Performing Arts.

ALAN WALKER

Lachner. German family of musicians.

(1) Theodor Lachner (b Rain am Lech, Upper Bavaria, 1788; d Munich, 23 May 1877). Composer and organist. He was court organist in Munich, a position he held until his death. He enjoyed a reputation as a composer of lieder and choral works, his quartets for men's voices being especially popular.

(2) Franz Paul Lachner (b Rain am Lech, 2 April 1803; d Munich, 20 Jan 1890). Composer and conductor, brother of (1) Theodor Lachner. He was the most celebrated member of the family. He received his first lessons in the piano and organ from his father, Anton Lachner, the city's organist. On his father's death in 1822, he went to Munich, where he scraped a living as an organist, music teacher and instrumentalist in the Isartor theatre orchestra. In 1823 he competed successfully for the post of organist at the Lutheran church in Vienna, where he was able to complete his musical education with Simon Sechter and the Abbé Stadler. He moved in the circle that included Schubert and Moritz von Schwind, and also came to know Beethoven. In 1827 he became assistant conductor at the Kärntnertortheater, and in 1829 was appointed its chief conductor. After an unsuccessful attempt to establish himself in Berlin, Lachner returned to Munich in 1836, where he quickly won a position of prominence in musical life. He was appointed conductor of the Munich Hofoper, directed the concerts of the Musikalische Akademie and also conducted the Königliche Vokalkapelle. He directed the music festivals of Munich in 1855 and 1863, and shared in directing the Salzburg Festival in 1855 and the Aachen festivals in 1861 and 1870. In 1852 he was appointed Generalmusikdirektor and in 1862 was awarded an honorary PhD at the University of Munich. His manifold activities came to an abrupt end in 1864 with Wagner's arrival in the city. His retirement, for which he applied in 1865, was accepted at first in the form of a holiday and became effective only in 1868, when Wagner's immediate influence in Munich had long since declined; the grateful city made Lachner an honorary citizen in 1883.

Lachner was prominent in the intellectual life of his time, being a friend of David L. Strauss, Eduard Mörike and Felix Dahn. Among his most important pupils were Joseph Rheinberger and Franz Wüllner. A prolific composer, he took Beethoven and Schubert as his models but was also influenced by Spohr, Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer. He wrote many craftsmanlike works, of which the opera Catarina Cornaro (1841), the seventh orchestral suite op.190 and the Requiem op.146 (revised 1872) in particular had great and lasting success. His other contributions to the musical life in Munich were as conductor of the Munich Opera orchestra, which he successfully prepared for the technical demands of Wagner's operas, and in raising the standards of the public's musical taste. His performances of opera and of works by Beethoven were considered exemplary. It was impossible for Lachner to warm to Wagner's music, and personal confrontations with Wagner and his circle did not improve the relationship between the two men. Despite this antagonism, which finally deprived him of the fruits of his work in Munich, Lachner showed his magnanimity in 1873 by repeating a suggestion he had made nine years earlier, that Wagner be awarded the Royal Maximilian Order – this time successfully.

He first worked as music tutor to a Polish count in Poznań and then went to Vienna at the invitation of his brother (2) Franz Lachner. In 1834 he succeeded Franz as Kapellmeister at the Kärntnertortheater, and took up the post of Kapellmeister in Mannheim two years later. In 1842 he directed a season of the Deutsche Operngesellschaft in London. He retired to Karlsruhe in 1872 and taught music at the conservatory there after 1884.

HORST LEUCHTMANN

Lachnith [Lachnitt], Ludwig Wenzel [Louis-Wenceslas] (b Prague, 7 July 1746; d Paris, 3 Oct 1820). Bohemian composer and horn player. He was probably the son of Franz Lachnith, a church musician in Prague, and in his youth learnt the violin, harpsichord and horn. From 1768 he was in the service of the Duke of Zweibrücken and in 1773 he received permission to travel to Paris, where he performed one of his own horn concertos at the Concert Spirituel on 28 March. Apparently he settled in Paris soon after 1780 (though remaining on the salary lists at Zweibrücken until 1786) studying the horn with Rodolphe (until obliged by ill health to discontinue) and composition with F.-A.D. Philidor. From 1781 to 1783 he appeared in the Concerts de la reine. After being exiled during the Revolution, he returned to Paris in 1801 and was appointed instructeur at the Opéra, holding this post for ten months and again from 1806 to 1816.

Lachnith wrote a number of orchestral and choral works but is remembered primarily for his stage works. His first, L'heureuse réconciliation (1785), offered evidence of a sound technique but was marred by a weak libretto: 'The result is sometimes laborious and painful, but one notices in it the ideas, appropriate intentions and intelligence of a good composer' (Mercure de France, 26 June 1785). It was performed only twice. Several elaborate pasticcio arrangements enjoyed greater publicity, the most infamous of which was his adaptation of Mozart's Die Zauberflöte entitled Les mystères d'Isis. Lachnith not only cut and rearranged the score, adding recitative to replace the spoken dialogue, but also incorporated music from other Mozart operas and a Haydn symphony. The work acquired the nickname 'Les misères d'ici' and was criticized by Berlioz as a 'wretched hotchpotch' (Mémoires, Paris, 1870/R), although Lachnith's intentions – 'to make a foreign comic opera worthy of the first theatre of Europe' (see Mongrédien) – were sincere. Les mystères was certainly popular, receiving regular performances in Paris for more than 25 years, and helped familiarize French audiences with Mozart's operatic style.

In collaboration with Christian Kalkbrenner, Lachnith based other pasticcios on religious subjects which were presented at the Opéra during Holy Week as oratorios en action in place of orchestral concerts. His original instrumental works include symphonies, concertos, accompanied keyboard sonatas (in a severely Classical style) and string quartets. He also arranged chamber works by Haydn and Pleyel for keyboard (sometimes with accompanying instruments) and published pedagogical essays on piano technique with J.L. Adam.

Lacombe [Trouillon-Lacombe], Louis (b Bourges, 26 Nov 1818; d Saint Vaast-la-Hougue, Manche, 30 Sept 1884). French composer, pianist and writer on music. He first studied the piano with his mother and at 11 entered the Paris Conservatoire for lessons with P.-J. Zimmermann; he won the premier prix within two years although he still had difficulty reaching the pedals. In 1832 he undertook a European concert tour and in 1834 he spent several months in Vienna studying the piano with Czerny, learning theory and orchestration from Sechter and Seyfried and learning some works of Beethoven. By 1840 he was back in Paris and, having decided to abandon a virtuoso's career in favour of composition, he soon published some piano pieces and chamber music. Marriage to a woman of some wealth enabled him to spend much of his time composing. In the 1850s he began writing stage works but most were performed only after his death. His best-known work, the dramatic symphony Sapho, was selected in a competition to be performed at the Paris Exposition Universelle in 1878. He contributed reviews and thoughtful, unpretentious articles to the Chronique musicale and other journals. His posthumously published, aptly titled Philosophie et musique is a series of essays discussing aesthetics, religion and a wide range of musical topics.

Lacombe wrote hundreds of works encompassing nearly all genres. He appears to have been most at ease in light, small-scale works; his songs are sensitive and witty and few of his many piano works reflect his own virtuoso technique. His unpretentious style is appropriate to the folk-orientated plots of certain of his operas, most of which, however, lapse occasionally into exaggerated grandiosity. The large symphonic works include experimental descriptive effects in the manner of Berlioz and David. His music is characterized by inventive melodies and effective use of syncopation and hemiola, but the harmonies rarely surpass in complexity the diminished 7th (which he evidently liked) and the simple, unvaried textures become tiresome in the longer works. His formal structures, however, are quite striking. The fantasia-like fourth-movement finale of the Piano Trio No.2 has 14 major tempo changes and several metre changes; it begins with the theme of the second-movement Scherzo, and later resurrects a transformed version of a prominent theme from the first movement, thereby establishing Lacombe as an early French explorer of cyclical structure.

Lacombe's second wife, Claudine Duclairfait (b Voisinlieu, Oise, 17 Jan 1831; d Saint Vaast-la-Hougue, 18 Sept 1902), was a celebrated singer at the Opéra-Comique under the name Andrée Favel. Later a highly esteemed teacher, she wrote, under the name Andrée Lacombe, La science du mécanisme vocal et l'art du chant (Paris, 1876) for which Lacombe provided the musical exercises and which was awarded a gold medal by the Société pour le Développement de l'Instruction Publique the following year.

JEFFREY COOPER

Lacombe, Paul (b Carcassonne, 11 July 1837; d Carcassonne, 5 June 1927). French composer. Although he travelled widely in Europe, he resided in his native town until his death. His only formal education was acquired from a local organist and former Paris Conservatoire pupil, François Teysserre, but he attentively studied the works of established masters. He was an admirer of Bizet, with whom he corresponded from 1866, and a personal friend of Saint-Saëns. In 1901 he was elected a corresponding member of the Institut and the following year he was made a Chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur.

Lacombe belonged to a generation of French composers who, inspired by the achievements of Mendelssohn and Schumann, wished to see symphonic and chamber music placed on a sound footing in France after the Franco-Prussian war. Many of his works were first performed by the Société Nationale de Musique, an organization he helped found in 1871 for the promotion of new French music. Although his compositions are technically assured, most of them lack the originality and spontaneity necessary to escape the powerful influence of contemporary German composers. Theatrical works are notably absent from his more than 150 opus numbers. He continued to compose until after his 80th birthday, and his output consists mainly of small piano pieces, chamber music, orchestral works and approximately 120 songs. His first violin sonata was performed by Sarasate in 1869 and his Third Symphony was awarded the prize of the Société des Compositeurs de Musique in 1886. Numerous works were left in manuscript.

JOHN TREVITT

Lacome [Lacome d'Estalenx], Paul(-Jean-Jacques) (b Le Houga, Gers, 4 March 1838; d Le Houga, 12 Dec 1920). French composer. He studied with José Puig y Absubide, organist in Aire-sur-Adour, 1857–60. He won a prize in a magazine competition, with an operetta, Le dernier des paladins, and settled in Paris, where he wrote music criticism and had over 20 operettas performed between 1870 and the end of the century, when he returned to his native Gascony. The most successful of them in France was Jeanne, Jeannette et Jeanneton (1876), the libretto of which had been turned down by Offenbach, but Ma mie Rosette (1890) achieved greater popularity in Britain. His most widely familiar composition is probably the 'Spanish Duet' Estudiantina (no.4 of Duos à deux voix égales) which was published in 1882 and around which Waldteufel wrote a waltz of the same name. Besides operettas and songs, Lacome composed orchestral and chamber music and piano pieces. Lacome was a close friend of Chabrier, whose high opinion of him is evident from his letters. He has been criticized for a certain affected and showy quality to his invention, and it may be this that prevented his music from achieving still greater success.

ANDREW LAMB

Lacorcia, Scipione (b ?Naples, ?*c*1585–95; d Naples, after 1620). Italian composer. On 15 March 1616 he dedicated his Secondo libro de madrigali for five voices (Naples, 1616[14]) to Alessandro Miroballo, the Marchese of Bracigliano, for whom the madrigals had already been performed. On 1 October 1620 he dedicated his Terzo libro de madrigali (Naples, 1620[18]) to Francesco Filomarino, Count of Castello Abbate. He was a successful imitator of Gesualdo in that he avoided the obvious in order to produce the unexpected. He treated the texts in great detail and often used a literal repetition of the opening and closing phrases – features which resulted in some of the lengthiest 17th-century Neapolitan madrigals. Contrasting passages of dissonances and suspensions, fast-moving diatonic counterpoint, and chordal writing are all features of his style. He used harsh dissonances more frequently than did Gesualdo, employing augmented triads, minor triads on sharp notes and juxtapositions involving false relations. He sometimes seemed purposely to have avoided tonal coherence; for example, a group of four phrases may be repeated exactly, but for one phrase transposed down a degree and bearing no apparent tonal relation to the other three.

KEITH A. LARSON

La Coste, Emanuel-Jean de. Dutch music seller who acquired the firm of ESTIENNE ROGER.

Lacoste [De La Coste], Louis (*b c*1675; *d c*1750). French composer. The two versions of his name are found in anthologies and on title-pages of his opera scores, but exemplars of the printed editions of Télégone, Orion and Biblis at Toulouse bear the autograph signature 'Lacoste'. He was a chorus member at the Opéra and is included in the register of musicians employed there in 1704 (see La Gorce). He introduced himself in the preface to his ballet Aricie (1697) as 'a man who writes only songs' (alluding to his airs sérieux et à boire published in the Ballard anthologies), not yet capable of more ambitious compositions. A document published by Campardon in 1701 reveals that he was involved in an adulterous affair with the wife of a watch maker who, on the indictment of her husband, was confined in a hospice. Lacoste is described in the document as a 'musicien de l'opéra'.

Lacoste found fame with the success of his tragedy Philomèle on 20 October 1705 (it was revived in 1709, 1723 and 1734), but this success was overshadowed two years later by the bruising failure of Bradamante. A new tragedy, Créuse l'Athénienne (April 1712) does not seem to have been well received, a failure confirmed by the absence of a revival. The following year Lacoste was named batteur de mesure (orchestral conductor) at the Opéra, and a year later maître de musique. In 1715 a new document published by Campardon shows him seeking to marry a singer at the Opéra, Madeleine Pasquier, 'with her mother's agreement', but an argument with the singer's father put an end to it. On 8 July 1717 he was dismissed from his post of maître de musique for some unknown reason and replaced by François Blouquier. Another document, dated 6 July 1720, is a 'three-year concession for the exclusive privilege of staging operas in the town of Lille . . . to Louis De La Coste, merchant, and Marie Catherine Robert his wife residing in Lille', but the title of merchant attributed to Lacoste makes the interpretation of this text uncertain. The title-page of the score of Télégone (1725) reads 'by M. Lacoste of the Académie Royale de Musique', and the Mercure de France of March 1728 (in a review of Orion) describes the composer as maître de chant at the same institution. He seems to have retained this position at least until the première of his last opera, Biblis, in 1732. After that we lose all trace of Lacoste. Antoine de Léris, in his Dictionnaire portatif (Paris, 1754, but completed, according to the author, in 1749) spoke of him as a 'musician who died some years ago'.

The career of Lacoste shows many similarities to that of Destouches. Like him, Lacoste began by writing airs sérieux et à boire; his first dramatic work was a kind of pastorale, Aricie, performed the same year (1697) as Destouches's pastorale-héroïque Issé; and, like Destouches, Lacoste gave priority to tragedy over ballet, rejected italianisms and appeared as a strict defender of the Lullyist tradition. But the parallel stops there: while Destouches's career was punctuated with brilliant successes which earned him important positions, that of Lacoste was much less glorious. Only Philomèle was accorded three revivals (in 1709, 1723 and 1734) and a parody (1723). Moreover, this work marks a turning-point in the history of tragédie en musique, moving away from the rather flavourless galantry of recent pieces to return to a more tragic conception which Lacoste upheld to the end, even in the years 1720–30 during which the ballet aesthetic predominated. Lacoste's tragédies all have a sombre and violent character which manifests itself in Philomèle (rape and murder) and continues up to Biblis (incest and suicide). The composer proved to be more inspired in the depiction of criminal characters (Térée, Télégone) than in the traditional musical depiction of love, and he thus occupies an original and even unique position among composers of the period. However (perhaps for this reason), apart from Philomèle none of his pieces enjoyed a genuine success except perhaps Télégone, which was performed for about a month and a half (from 6 November to 16 December 1725) but was never revived. Prince Antoine I of Monaco severely criticized Télégone, the music of which he found 'plagaristic and trivial' – a criticism which might seem to apply more to the libretto. In the Mercure de France contemporaries appreciated the quality of the recitative, the beauty of certain duets and the successful divertissements in Lacoste's works. There are also some highly expressive choruses and pretty dances, but overall the composer's inspiration seems to have been uneven. Lacoste's work is indicative of the crisis in tragédie en musique at this time. 'Of all composers since Lully', wrote Antoine I, 'I find only Destouches to have been creative; the others merely re-use songs like old garments from a second-hand clothes shop and give them that faint sheen of novelty that vanishes in a moment' (1725). The judgment is harsh and not altogether impartial, but one cannot help agreeing with it, at least in part, as far as Lacoste is concerned.

ROBERT FAJON

La Court, Antoine de (b Dordrecht, *c*1530–35; d Prague, 15 Sept 1600). Dutch singer and composer, active mainly in Austria. He was employed as a singer, first at the church of Ste Gudule and from 1550 in the imperial court chapel at Brussels. From 1559 to 1568 he served as an alto in the imperial Hofkapelle at Vienna, and from 1574 to 1590 as a tenor at the court of Archduke Ferdinand Innsbruck. During his time at Innsbruck he applied at least twice to return to the Hofkapelle at Vienna, but neither petitions nor the dedication of two masses to the Emperors Maximilian II and Rudolph II achieved the desired result. He was also refused an appointment at Munich. In 1581 he travelled to the Netherlands to recruit singers for the Innsbruck choir. He sought leave to give up his post in 1588 and petitioned for a pension which was granted two years later. He then joined the imperial chapel at Prague where he remained until his death. In 1593 his son Martin joined him at Prague after serving for 11 years as a chorister at Innsbruck. It is not known whether Antoine and Henri de La Court were related.

La Court's only extant works are two motets for five and six voices (in RISM 1568[6], 1610[18]). The earlier of these, Carole caesareo princeps (ed. in MAM, xxi–xxii, 1971), includes passages of effective declamation and makes imaginative use of harmonic sequences. The only surviving references to the two lost masses with which he attempted to secure his return to Vienna are in the imperial accounts which record payments of 25 florins made to him in 1574 and 1588.

ALBERT DUNNING

La Court, Henri de (b 1st half of 16th century; d ? Vienna or Prague, 13 March 1577). Dutch composer and singer, active mainly in Austria. According to Fétis he was a singer at Soissons Cathedral in 1547. From 23 August 1563 he was employed as an alto in the imperial Hofkapelle of Ferdinand I, Maximilian II and Rudolph II at Vienna and Prague; he also taught the choristers music, for which in 1570 he received 6 guilders monthly and a bonus of 18 guilders. He seems to have run into financial difficulties since the account books for 1574 and 1576 record payments to him of considerable sums of money in addition to his salary, and after his death his widow received help with their children's maintenance. It is not known whether he was related to Antoine de La Court. All eight of La Court's printed motets appeared in Pietro Giovanelli's Novus thesaurus musicus (RISM 1568[2-6]); one of those in the fifth book of the anthology (ed. in CMM, lxvi, 1974) is in honour of Giovanelli with whom he may have been on friendly terms. Six more motets for five, six, eight and ten voices survive in manuscript sources (A-Wn, D-Mbs including one in organ tablature). La Court's motets are representative of the style of works then favoured at the Habsburg courts; the settings are predominantly syllabic and homophonic though the texture is varied by pseudo-polychoral writing for different groups of voices.

Lacroix [Croix], Antoine (b Rambouillers, nr Nancy, 1756; d Lübeck, 18 June 1806). French violinist, composer and music dealer, active in Germany. He first studied the violin and composition with Joseph-Antoine Lorenziti, maître de chapelle at Nancy Cathedral. From 1780 to 1792 Lacroix lived in Paris where he achieved considerable fame as a violin virtuoso and published his Six Sonates pour piano et violon, op.1 (1784). He left Paris in 1792 because of the Revolution, travelling via Bruges to Bremen, where he evidently remained until 1794. He made several concert tours in Denmark and Germany, served for a short time as a chamber musician to the King of Prussia in Berlin, then from 22 January 1796 was a municipal musician in Lübeck. There he was also active in private concerts with the organist J.W.C. von Königslöw. From 1799 he built up a music trade, offering the most important current works by Haydn, Zumsteeg and Pleyel, as well as his own sonatas, duos and variations for the violin. His works were praised by his contemporaries for their brilliant and effective passages for the instrument, their pleasing melodies and their straightforward structures. (J. Hennings and W. Stahl: Musikgeschichte Lübecks, Kassel, 1951–2)

GEORG KARSTÄDT

La Croix [Delacroix], François de (b Senlis, 6 Jan 1683; d Paris, 8 April 1759). French composer. After initial musical training at Senlis Cathedral, he probably studied under Nicolas Bernier in Paris. He was maître de chapelle of the royal church of St Paul from 8 September 1714 to 12 September 1726, and succeeded Bernier in the same post at the Ste Chapelle from 18 September 1726. A priest, he was appointed permanent chaplain of the Ste Chapelle on 2 December 1744, succeeding P. Warnier, and on 30 January 1745 he was replaced as maître de chapelle by Abel-François Fanton, former maître de chapelle of Blois Cathedral. He composed a large number of motets, several of which were performed at the Concert Spirituel, and masses for the reopening of the Paris parliament. His surviving works consist of several airs published in Ballard's collections and one book of Motets à une, deux et trois voix avec symphonie et sans symphonie op.1 (Paris, 1741), which contains 14 of his motets and four posthumous motets by Bernier. La Croix's motets are distinguished by their sobriety of expression and clarity of part-writing.

Other musicians with the same name who may have been related include Abbé de La Croix, a singer at the Concert Spirituel from 1750 to 1759; Adrien de La Croix, a member of the 24 Violons in 1664 who composed an Allemande à 4 (D-Kl); and Pierre La Croix, a 'Maître Joueur d'Instruments' in Paris in 1724.

La Crotte, Nicolas de. See LA GROTTE, NICOLAS DE.

La Cruz, Zulema de (b Madrid, 9 March 1958). Spanish composer. She took higher degrees in piano and composition at the Madrid Conservatory (1986–8) and the MA at the Center for Computer Research in Music and Acoustics of the University of Stanford, California (1986–7). In 1988 she was appointed professor of electro-acoustic composition at the Madrid Conservatory and founded the Laboratorio de Informática Musical there. Her apprenticeship with John Chowning and Leland Smith at Stanford led to her specialization in electro-acoustic music, but she continued to compose for traditional groups of instruments. In these her interest in numerical structures and their combinations is evident, as can be seen in Kinesis-2 (1987) and in Seis para seis (1990). She has become increasingly interested in basing the structure of her works on mathematical relations of natural phenomena, such as volcanos in Chío (1989), or the cosmos in Púlsares (1990) and Erídano (1994). Her style is increasingly characterized by relatively simple forms effectively reinforced by a vigorous and striking use of dense textures.

Lacy, Michael Rophino (b Bilbao, 19 July 1795; d London, 20 Sept 1867). English violinist, composer, actor and playwright. According to Sainsbury (the source from which all other biographies derive), Lacy was a child prodigy who performed in public at the age of six a concerto by Giornovichi. He was educated at Bordeaux (1802) and Paris (1803), where he studied with Kreutzer. About the end of 1804 he performed for Napoleon. He played in the Netherlands on his way to London, which he reached in October 1805. His musical and linguistic skills earned him much success there: his first concert at the Hanover Square Rooms was given under the patronage of the Prince of Wales. In 1807 Lacy was in Dublin, performing with Catalini; he then moved on to Edinburgh, where he was engaged for Corri's concerts. Some time after that he left music for the theatre, acting in Dublin, Edinburgh and Glasgow. In 1818 he returned to music, succeeding Janiewicz as leader of the Liverpool concerts, and at the end of 1820 he returned to London where he led the ballet orchestra at the King's Theatre.

From 1827 to 1833 Lacy produced a series of skilful adaptations of French and Italian operas for the Drury Lane and Covent Garden theatres. He spent the season of 1830–31 in Paris, where he heard Paganini's first Parisian performance and urged (unsuccessfully, as it turned out) the Covent Garden management to engage him. Lacy's oratorio The Israelites in Egypt, a mixture of music by Rossini and Handel, was staged with great success in 1833; however, a second dramatic oratorio, Jephtha, was suppressed because of the perceived impropriety of having sacred characters acting in costume. Plays submitted to the Lord Chamberlain in 1836 listed him as a manager at Covent Garden. In September 1845 Lacy conducted Bellini's La sonnambula and other works at the Park Theatre in New York, where his daughter, Miss Delcy, sang. He directed a series of 'Handelian Operatic Concerts' at London in 1847, and during the 1850s he did much of the research for Schoelcher's biography of Handel and unpublished catalogue of Handel's music. Copies of Handel's music in Lacy's hand (GB-Lbl and F-Pc) show a wealth of annotations that are notable for their explorations of borrowings and of the compositional process.

A portrait of Lacy aged 12 was painted by the noted English miniaturist J. Smart; an engraving of that portrait by Anthony Cardon survives at the British Museum and the Harvard Theatre Collection. Lacy published numerous arrangements of arias by Handel, Rossini and others, and no doubt arranged more operas than are known at present. His greatest theatrical success was his adaptation of Rossini's La Cenerentola, which held the stage in both England and America for a considerable time.

RICHARD G. KING

Lacy, William (b 1788; d Devon, 1871). English bass. He is erroneously listed in many dictionaries as 'John Lacy'. He was a pupil of Rauzzini's at Bath. After singing in London he went to Italy for further study, mastering both the Italian language and style of singing. On his return he sang at concerts and the Lenten Oratorios; but though he had an exceptionally fine voice and execution, and offers from opera companies at Florence, Milan and later London, weak health prevented him from taking any prominent position. In 1817 he and his wife helped secure early subscribers and intelligence for the new journal planned by Richard Mackenzie Bacon, the Quarterly Musical Magazine and Review. The following year they accepted an engagement in Calcutta, returning to England about 1826. They retired into private life and resided at Florence and other continental cities before finally settling in England.

Lacy's wife, the soprano Jane Jackson (b London, 1776; d Ealing, 19 March 1858), first appeared at a London concert on 25 April 1798, and sang as Miss Jackson at the Concert of Ancient Music in 1800. That same year she married the composer Francesco Bianchi; while Mrs Bianchi she often sang at Windsor in the presence of George III and Queen Charlotte. She and Bianchi soon separated, he died in 1810, and she married Lacy in 1812, singing as Mrs Bianchi Lacy until 1815. Considered one of the finest interpreters of Handel as well as a good pianist and painter, she was noted for her grand, simple style and perfect delivery of Italian. Through her friendship with R.M. Bacon, portions of Bianchi's celebrated manuscript theory treatise were published in early volumes of the Quarterly Musical Magazine.

LEANNE LANGLEY

Łada [Ładowski, Ładewski], Kazimierz (b Blizno, nr Kalisz, 1824; d Włocławek, 5 Sept 1871). Polish violinist and composer. He had his first music lessons from his elder brother Maciej in Włocławek. In 1837 he moved to Warsaw where, with his brothers, he formed the Ładowskis Quintet, in which Kazimierz was first violin. He also gave solo performances in Poland and Russia. From 1854 to 1857 he was in Paris, where he studied composition with E. Collet and the violin with Delphin Alard. His playing was described as melodious, lilting and of great feeling, though technically imperfect; his programmes consisted mainly of his own compositions and salon pieces. In 1861 paralysis compelled him to give up concert performance. He composed more than 40 small pieces for violin in dance and other light forms. The best known were the Kujawiak in D (1850), Cygan, the Fantasy (1860) and the Caprice poétique (1862). His writings included 'Historia muzyki' (1860) and 'Materiały do historii muzyki w Polsce', published in Gazeta muzyczna i teatralna (1866).

JERZY MORAWSKI

Ladegast, Friedrich (b Hochhermsdorf, 30 Aug 1818; d Weissenfels, 30 June 1905). German organ builder. He trained under his brother Christlieb in Geringswalde and with Urban Kreutzbach in Borna, Mende in Leipzig and Zuberbier in Dessau. He set up in business on his own in Weissenfels in 1846. The excellence of his organ at Hohenmölsen led to a contract to repair and enlarge the organ in Merseburg Cathedral. When completed in 1855, this was the largest organ in Germany (four manuals, 81 stops); among those who played it was Liszt, whom it inspired to compose his Prelude and Fugue on B–A–C–H. Other major works by Ladegast include the organs of the Nikolaikirche, Leipzig (1858–62; four manuals, 86 stops), Schwerin Cathedral (1866–71; four manuals, 84 stops; extant, unaltered), and the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna (1872; three manuals, 55 stops; the case and pipes standing in the front survive). Ladegast was in the forefront of German organ builders of the 19th century. Unlike such master craftsmen as Walcker and Steinmeyer, he built slider-chests, but he also built cone-chests as early as *c*1875. He introduced pneumatic action in 1890. Ladegast followed the trends of German Romantic organ building (see SCHULZE) both in tone and in the relatively small proportion (by comparison with Cavaillé-Coll, for instance) of reeds in the specification. In the scale of his pipes he followed older methods in his early instruments, employing a basic ratio of 1:2 for the diameters of pipes an octave apart (also used by Bédos de Celles), but he later adopted J.G. Töpfer's ratio (see ORGAN, §III, 1), at first for the Principal chorus only, eventually for all stops. Ladegast was known in professional circles as the 'Nestor of German organ building'.

HANS KLOTZ/HERMANN J. BUSCH

Laderman, Ezra (b Brooklyn, NY, 29 June 1924). American composer. He attended the High School of Music and Art in New York, where he was the soloist in the first performance of his Piano Concerto (1939), given by the school orchestra. During World War II, while serving in the US Army, he composed the Leipzig Symphony, which was given its première in Wiesbaden in 1945. After the war he began composition study with Stefan Wolpe (1946–9) and entered Brooklyn College, CUNY (BA 1949), where he studied with Miriam Gideon. He continued his studies at Columbia University (MA 1952), where his teachers included Otto Luening and Douglas S. Moore. During the periods 1960–61 and 1965–6 he taught at Sarah Lawrence College. Other appointments included positions as composer-in-residence at SUNY, Binghamton (1971–82), visiting composer at Yale University (1988) and dean of the Yale School of Music (1989–95). In 1996 he was appointed professor of composition at Yale. Among his many honours are three Guggenheim fellowships (1955, 1958, 1964), the Prix de Rome (1963) and residencies at the Bennington Composers Conference (1967, 1968) and the American Academy in Rome (1982–3). He has also served as chair of the NEA's composer-librettist programme (1972), president of the AMC (1973–6) and director of the NEA music programme (1979–82). In 1985 he was elected president of the National Music Council. He has received commissions from the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Chicago SO, the New York PO, the American Recorder Society, Jean-Pierre Rampal, Yo-Yo Ma and Emanuel Ax, among others.

During his study with Wolpe, Laderman was introduced to the techniques of atonal and 12-note composition. Luening and Moore, however, challenged the young composer to free himself from the rigidity of these techniques and develop the long lyrical lines that became a hallmark of his style. Laderman's use of tonal materials in combination with atonal and aleatory elements, as in Priorities (1969), is particularly striking; also characteristic is his development of unusual formal structures, often arising from the transformation of unexpected ideas into musical shapes. In Double Helix (1968), for example, the oboe and flute repeatedly return at the same time to the tonic pitch and then move away in independent melodic and harmonic lines, musically duplicating the structure of DNA. Some of Laderman's most interesting compositional experiments appear in his string quartets. In the Fourth String Quartet (1974) a juxtaposition of dynamics, gesture, harmonic language and metre is explored, while in the Seventh Quartet (1983) the elaboration of separate ideas suggests a functional combination of development and recapitulation.

Laderman's ten operas, on a variety of biblical, historical and fantastic subjects, form a large part of his output. Perhaps the best known of these is Galileo Galilei (1978), a revision of his oratorio The Trials of Galileo (1967). Strongly rhythmic, dissonant and highly contrapuntal, lyricism does not prevail in this work. The drama is static, but purposeful in a Brechtian manner. With the commission and première of Marilyn by New York City Opera (1993), Laderman turned to American pop culture. Taking the actress Marilyn Monroe as its subject, the opera portrays her at the end of her life – drugged, depressed, unloved and ultimately betrayed. The music incorporates pop and jazz styles prevalent in the 1960s as well as maintaining Laderman's own musical aesthetic.

Lādhiqī [Muḥammad], al- (fl late 15th century). Arab theorist. His two treatises, one of which, al-Risāla al-fatḥiyya ('The victory treatise'), is dedicated to the Ottoman Sultan Bāyazīd II (1481–1512), are among the last significant additions to the Systematist school of theoretical writing derived from ṢAFĪ AL-DĪN. They treat mainly of intervallic relationships, tetrachord, pentachord and octave species, and rhythm; however, in common with several of the later Systematist treatises they make no significant theoretical contributions in these areas. Al-Lādhiqī is important, rather, for the information he provides on musical practice; while reproducing the definitions of the modes and rhythms given by earlier theorists, he also includes extensive lists relating to contemporary usage which give some insight into the various changes and developments taking place during the 15th century.

Ladipo, Duro (b Oshogbo, 18 Dec 1931; d Ibadan, 11 March 1978). Nigerian playwright. Ladipo was an internationally famous author of Yoruba popular plays. For the Duro Ladipo Theatre Group he served as director, actor, composer, choreographer and manager. He was the grandson of a drummer and the son of an Anglican catechist. He was a member of his school's choir from the age of nine, and wrote his first play while still in school. At the same time he began composing and adapting European hymns to the tonality of the Yoruba language. The performance of his Easter Cantata (1961) in Oshogbo sparked a controversy concerning the use of drums in churches. Ladipo thereafter began performing outside the church, changing his topics to historical themes that integrated Yoruba singing and drumming. He 'Yorubaized' popular theatre, and his new directions were highly successful. He produced 36 plays, not including his television scripts.

His play Oba Koso, which depicted the deified Alafin Shango of Oyo, became one of the most impressive theatrical productions of Ladipo's time. It was presented at the Berliner Festspiele (1964) and the Commonwealth Arts Festival in Liverpool (1965), and in Bahia (1969). His music fused elements of church music, highlife and traditional Yoruba drumming. Throughout his career Ladipo presented Yoruba history and culture in a positive way, and he is thus considered instrumental in the strengthening of the waning Yoruba identity.

WOLFGANG BENDER

Ladmirault, Paul (Emile) (b Nantes, 8 Dec 1877; d Camoël, nr La Roche-Bernard, Morbihan, 30 Oct 1944). French composer. He wrote music from childhood, and when he was eleven one of his works attracted the attention of Bourgault-Ducoudray. His first opera, Gilles de Retz, was written when he was fifteen and produced in Nantes in 1893. He studied at the Paris Conservatoire from 1897 to 1904, mainly as a pupil of Fauré, and became professor of harmony, counterpoint and fugue at the Nantes Conservatoire in 1920. He wrote music criticism for a number of journals, including the Revue Musicale.

The range and diversity of Ladmirault's music reflect his precocious talent and wealth of cultural interests. He was deeply attached to his native Brittany and to Celtic culture, and his output contains refined examples of regionalist composition as well as significant works in standard genres. Ladmirault was conscious of his music's indebtedness to Fauré and Ravel. His works embrace pure modality on the one hand and, on the other, a highly personal chromaticism with an appetite for strong dissonance. His harmonizations of traditional themes show an obvious desire to preserve their essential rhythmic character (in the barring especially), while the works inspired by folklore show great imagination in their treatment and development of motives.

YVES KRIER

La Douardière, Henri de. See L'ENCLOS, HENRI DE.

Ladurner, Ignace Antoine (François Xavier) [Ignaz Anton Franz Xaver/Joseph] (b Aldein, nr Bolzano, 1 Aug 1766; d Villain, nr Massy, 4 March 1839). French composer, pianist and teacher of Austrian descent, elder brother of JOSEF ALOIS LADURNER. His father, Franz Xaver (1735– 82), was an organist and teacher at Aldein and later at Algund (now Lagundo). Ignace studied music with his uncle Innozenz Ladurner (1745–1807) at the nearby monastery of Benediktbeuren and became the organist at Algund on his father's death. In 1784 he went to Munich to study at the Lyceum Gregorianum, leaving the organ position to Josef Alois. He soon completed his studies and moved to Longeville, near Bar-le-Duc, with Countess Heimhausen, a distinguished pianist, who apparently employed him to play music with her. He arrived in Paris in 1788 and soon developed a reputation as an outstanding teacher. From 1797 until 1802 he taught the piano at the Conservatoire, during which time his pupils won several prizes. However, his most famous pupils, Auber and Boëly, were taught privately. When the Conservatoire was re-formed as the Ecole Royale in 1816 he was appointed to the faculty but apparently never fulfilled this role. He married Mlle Magnier de Gondreville, a talented violinist; their son, Adolphe Ladurner, became known as a painter. In 1836, disabled by paralysis, he moved to his country home in Villain.

Ladurner wrote two operas and some chamber music, but most of his compositions were for the piano. According to Saint-Foix, Ladurner was more interested in solid construction than in the flashy style of his contemporary Steibelt, and his music, characterized by good counterpoint and unusual modulations, reveals thorough knowledge of Clementi's works, but is not reactionary. In his sonatas the opening movements are melodically less attractive than the later movements; there is often a disparity between the first subjects, which are pre-Romantic in inflection, and the more galant second subjects. Popular airs are used in the Mélanges harmoniques, and his opéra comique Les vieux fous is notable for the ingenuity of the orchestration. Ladurner influenced his pupils, particularly Boëly, both through his interest in new ideas and his continual study of established masters.

Ladurner, Josef Alois (b Algund, nr Merano, 7 March 1769; d Brixen [Bressanone], 20 Feb 1851). Austrian composer, brother of IGNACE ANTOINE LADURNER. He studied with his uncle at the monastery of Benediktbeuern, became organist at Algund in 1784, and attended the Lyceum Gregorianum at Munich where he studied theology and philosophy until 1798. He also had piano lessons and received instruction in composition and counterpoint from the Hofclaviermeister Josef Graetz. He became a priest in 1799, and held various positions at the prince-bishop's consistory at Brixen, including those of court chaplain from 1802 and councillor from 1816. Although he was not a professional musician, he directed choirs, gave piano lessons and participated in the activities of music societies at Innsbruck and Salzburg. His compositions, which were highly regarded by his contemporaries, include variations and fantasias for the piano, considerable church music and some pedagogical works; many of his works remain in manuscript.

La Fage, (Juste-)Adrien(-Lenoir) de (b Paris, 30 March 1805; d Charenton, 8 March 1862). French composer and writer on music. He was a grandson of the celebrated architect Lenoir. Educated for the church and the army, he decided instead on a career in music, and as a harmony and counterpoint pupil of Perne made a particular study of plainsong; he was then a pupil, and later assistant, of Choron. In 1828, sent by the government to Rome, he studied for a year under Baini, and while in Italy produced a farce, I creditori, but he never gained any distinction in this genre. On his return to Paris (December 1829) he was appointed maître de chapelle of St Etienne-du-Mont, where he substituted an organ (built by John Abbey) for the harsh out-of-tune serpent previously used with the chant. At the same time he held a similar post at the church of St François-Xavier, where he restored much ancient plainchant and introduced antiphonal singing for men's and boys' choirs.

La Fage spent the years 1833–6 in Italy and while he was there his wife and son both died. On returning to Paris he published the Manuel complet de musique vocale et instrumentale (1836–8), of which the first chapters had been prepared by Choron, some critical works and collections of biographical and critical articles. He visited Italy again after the 1848 revolution and made copies of previously unstudied manuscripts; he also visited Germany and Spain, and England during the 1851 Great Exhibition. He finally settled in Paris and published the works on which his reputation rests. Overwork as an author and as general editor of Le plainchant, a periodical which he founded in 1859, brought on a nervous illness that ultimately led to his removal to the insane asylum at Charenton.

La Fage was a prolific composer of sacred music and also wrote some chamber music for flute, but is remembered as a historian and didactic writer. His Cours complet de plain-chant (1855–6) fully justifies its title. It was succeeded in 1859 by an equally valuable supplement, the Nouveau traité de plain-chant romain (with questions). His Histoire générale de la musique et de la danse, though dealing only with Chinese, Indian, Egyptian and Hebrew music, is a careful and conscientious work. His learning and method appear conspicuously in his Extraits du catalogue critique et raisonné d'une petite bibliothèque musicale and in his Essais de diphthérographie musicale, works of particular importance in that they refer to manuscripts and documents now lost. His substantial library was catalogued (Paris, 1862) and afterwards dispersed by auction. His unpublished works and materials including his compositions are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, to which he bequeathed all his papers, with the manuscripts of Choron and Baini in his possession.

GUSTAVE CHOUQUET/ARTHUR HUTCHINGS

La Fage, Jean de (*fl c*1518–30). Composer, probably of French birth. On stylistic grounds, La Fage was probably trained before the turn of the 15th century. He is cited in lists of musicians in Rabelais' prologue to book 4 of Pantagruel and in a noël by Jean Daniel written about 1525–30. The Ferrarese singer Turleron described La Fage as 'a contrabass, the best in Italy', according to a letter of June 1516 from the Ferrarese agent Enea Pio to Cardinal Ippolito I d'Este. Pio noted that La Fage was highly esteemed by Pope Leo X, and he indicated that the composer and several choirboys had recently arrived in Rome among the retinue of the Cardinal of Auch, François Guillaume de Clermont. La Fage has been proposed as a conduit for the transmission of music and musical influence between southern France and Italy during the early decades of the 16th century.

La Fage left thirteen motets (one of which is fragmentary) and two chansons. His works, chiefly preserved in Italian and French sources between 1518 and 1535, are notable for their expressive intensity, powerful rhythmic pull and tendency towards pervasive melodic imitation. La Fage's motets are similar to those of his greater contemporary Jean Mouton in scope and frequent use of voice-pairing, but may be distinguished by their more continuous rhythmic motion, colourful yet euphonious harmonies and often expressive use of dissonance. The motets based on plainchant exhibit both migrant cantus firmus techniques and melodic paraphrase. His one chanson employs short points of imitation, homorhythmic voice pairing, animated rhythms, short phrases, and syllabic text setting.

La Farge, P. de (fl 1539–46). French or Franco-Flemish composer. Although Eitner (EitnerS and EitnerQ) considered La Farge and JEAN DE LA FAGE to be the same person, they were in fact two different composers. Between 1539 and 1547 eight Latin motets and two French chansons were published by Jacques Moderne of Lyons with attribution to 'P. de la Farge'. The composer may be identifiable with Pierre de La Farge, a canon at the collegiate church of St Just, Lyons, whose will was attested on 18 August 1559.

SAMUEL F. POGUE

LaFaro, Scott (b Newark, NJ, 3 April 1936; d Geneva, NY, 6 July 1961). American jazz double bass player. His family moved to Geneva, New York, when he was five years old. He started playing the clarinet at the age of 14; later, in high school, he took up the tenor saxophone, and finally studied the double bass at Ithaca Conservatory and in Syracuse. In 1955–6 he travelled with Buddy Morrow's band to Los Angeles, where he began his career as a jazz musician as a member of Chet Baker's group (1956–7). After playing briefly in Chicago with Ira Sullivan, he accompanied Sonny Rollins and Harold Land in San Francisco (1958) and worked with Barney Kessel and played in a group at the Lighthouse Cafe in Hermosa Beach, California. In 1959 he moved to New York and toured briefly with Benny Goodman, then joined a trio led by Bill Evans (with Paul Motian). He remained with Evans until his early death in a road accident, though he also led his own trio and worked with Stan Getz. His recordings with Evans (notably Sunday at the Village Vanguard, 1961, Riv.) and Ornette Coleman (1960–61) set the standard for a new generation of jazz bass players who varied their accompaniments by mixing traditional time-keeping bass lines with far-ranging countermelodies in free rhythm.

Lafayette Quartet. Canadian-based string quartet. It was formed in Detroit in 1984 by members of the Renaissance City Chamber Players, the Canadian violinist Ann Elliott-Goldschmid and three US musicians – Sharon Stanis, Joanna Hood and Pamela Highbaugh – who had previously played in a quartet led by their tutor at Indiana University, Rostislav Dubinsky, formerly of the Borodin Quartet. Coached by Dubinsky, the four won the 1988 Fischoff National Chamber Music Competition, taking prizes in addition at competitions in Portsmouth (1988) and Chicago (1989). They were also helped by the Cleveland Quartet, whose competition they won in 1986, and by members of the Alban Berg and Amadeus Quartets. Since 1991 they have been artists-in-residence at the University of Victoria School of Music, British Columbia, but they have been encouraged to tour regularly. They play a wide repertory with perceptive musicianship and refinement and beauty of tone. Their recordings include the Dvořák piano quintets (with the Czech-born Canadian pianist Antonín Kubálek) and the quartets of Murray Adaskin. For a time they played on the Amatis belonging to the University of Saskatchewan but now all except Hood use modern instruments. In the 1999–2000 season they gave their first Beethoven cycle, in Victoria.

TULLY POTTER

La Feillée, François de (*d c*1780). French theorist. He probably lived in or near Poitiers around 1750. His reputation stands on his Méthode nouvelle pour apprendre parfaitement les règles du plainchant et de la psalmodie (Poitiers, 1748), which appeared nine times in four editions up to 1784. It advocates the 'expressive' performance of chant in accord with the doctrine of the Affections as it was then understood. La Feillée wrote: 'Expression is an image which sensitively renders the character of all that one utters in singing, and which depicts it realistically'. The use of trills and other ornamentation is recommended, and relative speeds of delivery are prescribed. The same text should be sung more slowly on a solemn feast-day than on normal days, but otherwise the immediate contents of the text should determine the manner of singing: prayers are to be sung 'devoutly and sadly', narrative texts 'without any passion but with good pronunciation'. The treatise provides a valuable sidelight on the history of chant performance, and may reflect the kinds of expressive effect that 18th-century composers of religious music may have intended. La Feillée also published Epitome gradualis romani (Poitiers, n.d.) and Epitome antiphonarii romani (Poitiers, 1746).

MARY HUNTER

La Ferté, Denis-Pierre-Jean, Papillon de (b Châlons-sur-Marne, 18 Feb 1725; d Paris, 7 July 1794). French courtier and administrator. Having moved to Paris in the mid-1740s, he completed his law studies and subsequently bought three official positions: intendant-contrôler de l'argenterie (1756), menus-plaisirs (1762) and affaires de la chambre du roi (1762). He also obtained management of the Comédie-Italienne in 1760, of the Comédie-Française two years later, and organized, amid a web of intrigue, the amalgamation of the Comédie-Italienne with the Opéra-Comique in February 1762). At the king's request La Ferté assisted in the reorganization of the Opéra in 1776, and although this occupied him only until the following year, he later took over the administration of the Opéra for ten years, from 1780 to 1790. A related responsibility for him, from 1784, was the direction of the Ecole Royale de Chant (the forerunner of the Paris Conservatoire).

La Ferté emerges, through documentary evidence and through his own journal (which offers valuable insights into life at court) as a clever, at times unscrupulous, figurehead who wielded considerable power. Dealing predominantly with matters relating to personnel and finance, he handled discontented artists from the institutions under his control adroitly, if not always sympathetically. As intendant des menus-plaisirs, La Ferté was responsible for all royal ceremonies including the coronation of Louis XVI. Having enjoyed an amicable friendship with Mme de Pompadour, he later found himself in frequent conflict with Marie Antoinette over the cost of meeting her extravagant tastes, and in particular her generous payments to singers and musicians, which he felt encouraged an over-familiarity. She, in turn, rebuked him on one occasion for his manners towards the librettist Sedaine. During the Revolution La Ferté was guillotined; his autobiographical note written in prison on the eve of his death is reproduced in Jullien (1876).

L'Affilard was the first composer to supply metronomic indications for his own music, and he was scrupulous in editing it, indicating breathing places, ornaments and notes inégales. His surviving music amounts to about three dozen elegant airs de mouvement or dance-songs, which are found in manuscript (in F-V and CDN-Mn), in Recueils published by Ballard (RISM 1695^3 and 1697^2, and two others of 1701 and 1705) and especially in what might be termed his 'complete works': the Principes très-faciles pour bien apprendre la musique (Paris, 1694), which was reprinted many times up to 1747. The Principes is a treatise on sight-singing which he seems to have used as a laboratory, for he reworked and recomposed the songs in each fresh edition up to the fifth (a secular version printed twice in 1705) and sixth (a sacred version also printed in 1705). When he replaced tempo words with metronome indications in 1705, the 'complete works' reached its final form, and all subsequent editions are based on either the fifth or sixth edition.

The Principes would be a rather ordinary self-tutor were it not for the high quality of L'Affilard's dance-songs, which are regular and can be danced to. The anthology is important for the insights it provides on questions of the tempo, articulation, phrasing, ornamentation and quality of movement of early 18th-century dance music. However, scholars are not in agreement over the interpretation of the tempo indications. L'Affilard based these on the pendulum of JOSEPH SAUVEUR, which is divided logarithmically into 60th parts of a second, but he seems to have understood Sauveur's system imperfectly. It could be that L'Affilard employed a quarter-length pendulum, where a complete vibration equals the musical beat, but he recorded his pendulum lengths using Sauveur's scale of tierces du temps, which is calculated for half vibrations. This would give metronome indications as shown in Table 1. An asterisk indicates that no contemporary choreography exists, and question marks indicate tempos that are unreasonably slow.

Lafleur, Joseph René (b Paris, 9 June 1812; d Maisons-Laffitte, nr Paris, 18 Feb 1874). French bowmaker. His father Jacques Lafleur was also a violin maker and bowmaker. Joseph René appears to have worked initially as a violinist. Details concerning his apprenticeship as a maker do not survive, though he did not learn from his father, whose work he far surpassed. It is reasonable to assume that his earlier career as a violinist afforded him many opportunities to examine and consider a wide range of transitional and post-transitional bows. This would explain his early tendencies towards experimentation with shaft resistance and flexibility and the use of a 'pikes-head' tip. His later association with Nicolas Maire, probably resulted in a further apprenticeship of sorts. Following this period the 'pikes-head' tips were modified, although a certain elongation remained. His mature work possesses playing qualities of the highest order. His bows are occasionally branded LAFLEUR; it is also possible that a certain amount of his work bears the brand of Nicolas Maire.

Lafont, Charles Philippe (b Paris, 1 Dec 1781; d nr Tarbes, 14 Aug/10 Jan 1839). French violinist and composer. His mother, a sister of the violinist Bertheaume, gave him his first violin lessons, which were continued under his uncle's guidance. At the age of 11 he was ready to accompany Bertheaume on a concert tour to Germany, where his precocious talent was much admired. On his return to Paris, Lafont resumed his studies, first under Kreutzer (with whom he worked for two years), then for a brief period with Rode. He also developed an attractive voice and appeared occasionally as a singer of French ballads. In 1801 he gave concerts in Belgium, and in 1802 was acclaimed at the Concert Français in Paris. Soon he was recognized as one of France's leading violinists, and his pre-eminence was firmly established when Rode left for Russia in 1803. There followed successful tours in Germany, the Netherlands and England. In 1808 he was appointed solo violinist to the Tsar, succeeding Rode, and he remained in St Petersburg for six years. In 1815 he was named solo violinist to Louis XVIII.

Resuming his travels, Lafont had a memorable encounter with Paganini in Milan in 1816. They agreed, on Lafont's suggestion, to give a joint concert at La Scala; the programme consisted of a double concerto by Kreutzer as well as solo works by the two artists. This event is often described as a 'contest' in which Lafont was allegedly humiliated by Paganini's wizardry. In fact, in a letter, Paganini praised Lafont's artistry and even conceded his 'greater beauty of tone', but concluded, 'He plays well but he does not surprise' (de Courcy, p.147). Lafont, angered by the persistent story of his 'defeat', published his own belated version of the encounter in The Harmonicon in 1830, saying: 'I was not beaten by Paganini, nor he by me' and defending the French school as 'the first in the world for the violin'. This statement was made when Paganini was at the height of his fame. Whatever the outcome of the encounter, Lafont's supreme self-assurance remained unshaken, and he continued his career for more than 20 years. Spohr, who heard him in Paris in 1821, ranked him first among French violinists and admired his 'beauty of tone, the greatest purity, power, and grace', but criticized the lack of 'deeper feeling'. In the course of his career, Lafont often collaborated with prominent pianists, among them Kalkbrenner, Herz, Osborne and Moscheles; these partnerships produced joint compositions for violin and piano in which both instruments were treated with equal brilliance. Lafont died in a carriage accident while on a concert tour in the south of France.

Lafont represented French violin playing at its best. He inherited the classical technique of the Viotti school through his teachers Kreutzer and Rode, but modernized it by making it more brilliant and idiomatic. Thus he stands midway between Rode and Bériot. His encounter with Paganini came too late to influence his style and he was gradually overshadowed by the rising generation of Paganini-inspired virtuosos. As a composer, Lafont was of little importance: his seven violin concertos lack musical distinction, and his numerous fantasias and airs variés on operatic themes do not rise above the mediocre level of fashionable virtuoso music. Thanks to his pianist-collaborators, particularly Moscheles, higher musical standards are displayed in his duos concertants. He also composed more than 200 French ballads (romances), which for a time were very popular, and an opera, La rivalité villageoise (1799). Other operas mentioned by Fétis cannot be traced.

La Font, de. See DELAFONT.

Lafont, Jean-Philippe (b Toulouse, 4 Feb 1951). French baritone. He studied in Toulouse and then at the Opéra-Studio in Paris, where he made his début as Papageno in 1974 and in 1977 sang Nick Shadow in The Rake's Progress. He subsequently sang regularly in Toulouse (where he took part in the première of Landowski's Montségur in 1985) and in 1987 in the title role of Falstaff. At the Opéra-Comique in Paris he has taken part in the revivals of Gounod's Le médecin malgré lui, Philidor's Tom Jones and the Offenbach triple bill, Vive Offenbach!, and in 1982 sang all four sinister roles in Les contes d'Hoffmann. In 1983 he made his American début at Carnegie Hall in a concert performance of Benvenuto Cellini; his Metropolitan début was as Escamillo in 1988, and in 1991 he sang Jack Rance in La fanciulla del West at La Scala, Milan. One of the most versatile French baritones of his generation, Lafont also includes in his repertory roles such as Rigoletto, Amonasro, Barak (Die Frau ohne Schatten), Leporello, Sancho Panza, William Tell, Golaud and Nabucco. In 1996 he created the role of the villain, Scarpiof, in Landowski's Galina in Lyons. His many recordings include Debussy's La chute de la maison Usher with Prêtre, Les mamelles de Tirésias with Ozawa, Falstaff with Gardiner and La belle Hélène with Plasson. He has also appeared as an actor in the films Parole de Flic and Babette's Feast.

PATRICK O'CONNOR

La Font, Joseph de (b Paris, 1686; d Passy, 30 March 1725). French librettist and playwright. His masterpiece is the opéra-ballet Les fêtes, ou Le triomphe de Thalie (music by Mouret, 1714). Although not the work in which the 'comic element was first introduced into the sphere of French opera' (compare for example Les Muses of 1703 and Les fêtes vénitiennes of 1710), Les fêtes de Thalie deals with flesh-and-blood characters, soubrettes, petits maîtres and coquettish widows. La Font stated that this was the 'first Opéra where one sees the women dressed à la Françoise'. The frequently mentioned scandale arose from La Font's bold stroke, in the prologue, of having Thalia (muse of Comedy) triumph over Melpomene (muse of Tragedy) in a setting representing the stage of the Paris Opéra. La Font and Mouret lost no time in composing another entrée, La critique des fêtes de Thalie, and in changing the name of the opéra-ballet to Les fêtes de Thalie, all of which appeared to placate the aestheticians. In 1722 a new entrée, 'La provençale', was added, proving the most popular of all, and holding the stage until 1778. La Font's other works for the lyric stage include two tragédies en musique, Hypermnèstre (1716) and Orion (1728, completed by S.-J. Pellegrin), and the ballet Les amours de Protée (1720). In addition, he collaborated with Lesage and d'Orneval for the Opéra-Comique.

JAMES R. ANTHONY

La Fontaine, Jean de (b Château-Thierry, Aisne, 8 July 1621; d Paris, 13 April 1695). French poet, fabulist, dramatist and librettist. He was educated at Château-Thierry and in Paris, where he finally settled in 1661, having spent months at a time there from 1658. He quickly established links with leading writers and musicians (Molière, Jean Racine and Boileau-Despréaux; Michel Lambert and Lully) and with their patrons (Nicolas Fouquet, Henri Loménie, count of Brienne and Madeleine de Scudéry). Frequenting salons such as the Hôtel de Nevers he met Mme de Sévigné, Mme de la Fayette, La Rochefoucauld and other prominent arbiters of taste. When his first patron, the Duchess of Orléans, died in 1672, he sought refuge with Mme de la Sablière, who protected him until her death in 1693. He was faithful to friends such as Fouquet and the Duchess of Bouillon even when they were disgraced. He received few formal honours and little financial reward, and not until 1684 was he elected to the Académie Française.

La Fontaine is principally renowned for his gently ironic stories (Contes et nouvelles en vers, 1665–6) and for the finely drawn portrait of man that emerges from his fables (Fables choisies mises en vers, 1668, 1679). Many composers since his day have taken tales from both volumes as the basis of both stage and concert works. But La Fontaine's love of variety and his taste for novelty led him to experiment with many other literary forms, including drama. His first published work (1654) was a translation of Terence's Eunuchus, and his second dramatic effort was a ballet, Les rieurs du Beau-Richard (the music for which is lost), performed at Château-Thierry in 1659 or 1660, about the time that he composed his comedy Clymène. These early works show that he was aware of the need to adapt material to prevailing tastes and that he could exploit the dramatic and comic elements latent in a situation; they also show how he found it difficult to sustain a tone for long or to keep personal interjections out of the drama.

Diversity was essential to La Fontaine's view of art, and music played an equally important role in creating those effects of charm and grace by which he judged good style. As a spectator he found such effects in the ballet Les fâcheux, given at Vaux in 1661. In 1671 his Les amours de Psyché et de Cupidon (1659) inspired Psyché, the tragédie-ballet created by Molière and Lully with the aid of Quinault and Corneille. Lully's collaboration with Quinault, which began after Molière's death in 1673, was temporarily interrupted early in 1674, and he asked La Fontaine for a libretto. He produced the pastoral Daphne, light in tone, lyrical and graceful. It did not please: Lully required something more heroic, more dramatically consistent. La Fontaine's characteristic lyricism and irony were indeed unsuitable for opera librettos, where drama and simplicity are demanded; furthermore his self-conscious, independent character was incompatible with Lully's taxing, temperamental demands. Despite his consequent criticism of Lully (in the comedy Le florentin, 1674) and of opera as a form (in a verse letter to Pierre de Niert, 1677), he wrote the unfinished libretto Galatée (1682), dedicatory verses for Lully (Amadis, 1684, and Roland, 1685), and Astrée (1691). This last work, set to music by Pascal Collasse, received only six performances: La Fontaine had persisted in seeing Louis XIV as a lyrical Apollo rather than as a heroic Jupiter, and he had also indulged his private taste for make-believe and enchantment, showing that his gifts were more appropriate to armchair theatre than to tragédie lyrique.

MARGARET M. McGOWAN

Lagacé, Bernard (b St Hyacinthe, Quebec, 21 Nov 1930). Canadian organist. He studied in St Hyacinthe and Montreal with Conrad Letendre (organ), Yvonne Hubert (piano) and Gabriel Cusson (music theory). A scholarship from the Quebec government enabled him to perfect his organ technique in Paris from 1954 to 1956 under the aegis of André Marchal, whose assistant he became at St Eustache; he gave his first official recital there in June 1956. He then spent a year working with Heiller at the Vienna Music Academy. In 1957 he was appointed organ professor at the Quebec Conservatoire in Montreal and returned to Canada; he continued to give numerous concerts and recitals in Europe as well as in Canada and the USA. He was a prizewinner in the international competitions at Ghent and Munich and in the USA. Lagacé has exerted considerable influence both through his masterclasses and lectures, and through his important part in the organ revival in Canada. He has also frequently served as a jury member at international organ competitions. He has twice performed the complete organ works of Bach in Montreal (1975–7 and 1987–9), and has made several recordings, including Couperin's Messe pour les convents, The Art of Fugue and a Frescobaldi programme, all of which combine a classical purity of style with a rigorous approach to interpretation.

JACQUES THÉRIAULT/GILES BRYANT

Lagacé [née Begin], Mireille (b St Jérôme, PQ, 8 June 1935). Canadian organist, harpsichordist and teacher. After studying in Montreal and Vienna (with Anton Heiller), she embarked on a career as an organist, harpsichordist and (from 1988) fortepianist, performing in North America and western Europe and winning various prizes. She has taught the harpsichord in Montreal and New England and Baroque performance in North America and France, and teaches both subjects at the Conservatoire de Musique du Québec in Montréal. She also plays and teaches at organists' conventions in North America. Although a champion of the Baroque repertory, Lagacé also plays 20th-century music and has had several works written for her. She has recorded organ works by Buxtehude and other Baroque composers, an anthology of French organ music and the complete harpsichord works of Bach. She is known for her colourful and imaginative interpretations of Baroque music and as a sensitive performer of the French Romantic repertory.

GILES BRYANT

Lagarde [La Garde], Mr. See LAGUERRE, JOHN.

La Garde [Lagarde, Garde], Pierre de (b nr Crécy-en-Brie, Seine-et-Marne, 10 Feb 1717; *d c*1792). French composer and baritone. As an ordinaire de la chambre du roi he was highly regarded by Louis XV, who made him responsible for the musical training of the royal children. In 1755 he shared this duty with Mion, Maître de musique des enfants de France, and gained the title himself two years later. He was an assistant conductor at the Opéra from 1750 to 1755 and on the resignation of François Francoeur in 1756 he became compositeur de la chambre du roi. Some time later he was placed in charge of the concerts given for the Count of Artois. He is also reported to have taught the harp to Marie Antoinette. La Borde described him as having a baritone voice of wide compass and great facility.

La Garde's reputation as a composer was firmly established when his Aeglé, a pastorale héroïque in one act, was performed at Madame de Pompadour's Théâtre des Petits Cabinets in 1748; it is indebted to Rameau, particularly in its orchestral style. Two years later it was incorporated into La journée galante as the second act of that opéra-ballet; the first and last acts, of which no scores are extant, were La toilette de Vénus and Léandre et Héro. While there is no record of La journée galante being performed outside court circles, Aeglé was performed at the Opéra in 1751 and continued to be played there until 1777. Other works commissioned by Madame de Pompadour were Silvie, a full-length pastorale héroïque performed at Versailles in 1749, and L'impromptu de la cour de marbre, a divertissement comique performed in her country house at Bellevue in 1751 after the Théâtre des Petits Cabinets at Versailles had been dismantled.

La Garde's lyrical gifts were often charmingly displayed in his airs, cantatas and cantatilles. Among his collections of airs were three volumes of brunettes (1764) with harp or guitar (both much in vogue at the time) and sometimes harpsichord or violin accompaniment. The guitar was also used to accompany some of the cantatilles in his Journal de musique (1758); although such works represent a decline in the French cantata, La Garde also composed cantatas and cantatilles of a high artistic level: for a long time his La musette was attributed to Rameau. His last published works were contained in two volumes entitled Les soirées de l'Ille Adam, dedicated to the Prince of Conti. They contained airs (and a cantatille, L'amant malheureux) for one and two voices accompanied by violin, oboe, bassoon, horn and bass. As in the works of a number of French composers at this time the music, in both thematic and instrumental writing, was greatly influenced by the nascent Classical style. While La Garde seems to have written no compositions during the last 25 years of his life, his airs remained popular for many years. In 1780 La Borde stated that the composer's 'charming duets and melodious songs will always be sung with pleasure by music lovers. He is, without doubt, the finest composer in this genre'.

Lagarto, Pedro de (*b c*1465; d Toledo, 1543). Iberian composer. In a document dated 1537 he is said to have been in the service of Toledo Cathedral for 62 years. If he entered the cathedral in 1475 it was probably as a choirboy. From June 1490 he was master of the choirboys (claustrero). In 1495 he succeeded in obtaining a prebend as a singer in open contest: the winner was to be the 'most accomplished and fluent singer' and highly trained in polyphonic composition. In 1507 he was seriously ill and does not seem to have resumed his duties as claustrero after this time. He held at least two chaplaincies at the cathedral and between 1530 and 1534 was 'maestro de ceremonias'. By 1537, being deaf and blind, he asked to be relieved of his duties as chaplain; he died towards the end of 1543.

No Latin-texted work is attributed to Lagarto although the copying of a book of polyphonic villancicos for Christmas and Epiphany undertaken in 1507 by the cathedral scribe Alonso Fernández de Roa was apparently executed under Lagarto's supervision. One of Lagarto's songs Andad, pasiones, andad was copied in the Cancionero Musical de La Colombina and is a villancico in form, as are two of his other songs included in the original layer of the Cancionero Musical de Palacio. All three villancicos draw on different themes: Andad, pasiones, andad is an intensely emotional love song, Callen todas las galanas compares the ladies of Seville and Toledo, and D'aquel fraire flaco is an anticlerical satire. His one surviving romance, Quéxome de ti, ventura, is a lament against the vicissitudes of Fortune.

Lagidze, Revaz (b Bagdadi, western Georgia, 10 July 1921; d Tbilisi, 16 Oct 1981). Georgian composer. A student of Balanchivadze at the Tbilisi State Conservatory (graduating in 1948, postgraduate studies until 1950), he worked as a violinist in the Georgian Radio SO, as a music editor for documentary films (1960–62) and then was head of the music faculty of the Pushkin State Institute in Tbilisi until his death. He was awarded the Rustaveli Prize (1975), the USSR State Prize (1977) and the Paliashvili Prize (1991). A composer of Romantic and nationalist inclinations, his opera Lela represents the peak of his output and is replete with eloquent cantilena, lyrical imagination and an artistic sense of drama. As a whole, his works are regarded as a national treasure in Georgia as well as having won recognition outside that country. His language is inflected by the richness of Georgian musical dialects, many of which – such as those of ancient sacred songs, peasant songs and urban folk music – are originally reinterpreted in a style marked by nobility, emotion and poeticism. The changes which occurred in Georgian song writing in favour of a more professional approach are generally attributed to Lagidze, whose own songs, whether solo, ensemble or choral in scope, are characterized by a patriotic and ethical sensibility. His aesthetic outlook was democratic and so he sought to associate with a wide audience and win its recognition.

MANANA AKHMETELI

Lagkhner, Daniel (b Marburg, Lower Styria [now Maribor, Slovenia], after *c*1550; d after 1607). Austrian composer. A minor master of early Protestant music, he was among the first composers born in Styria. On the title-page of his major publication, Soboles musica, he described himself as citizen and organist of Loosdorf in Lower Austria; in his publications of 1606 and 1607 he called himself 'symphonista' and 'musurgus' of the barons of Losenstein, founders of a notable Protestant grammar school at Loosdorf (1574–1619) in which Lagkhner probably taught. Evidence of his connection with the school is to be found in his three-part Flores Jessaei for boys' voices, and in his four-part Florum Jessaeorum semina, also set mainly for equal voices. After 1607 he may well have gone into exile on account of his Protestant sympathies. Fétis maintained that he became Kapellmeister of St Sebaldus, Nuremberg; this, however, is based on inferences wrongly drawn from the place of publication of Lagkhner's works.

The 28 motets in the Soboles musica, for four to eight voices, are characterized by an abundant use of contrary motion, quasi-polyphony, block harmony and by both simulated and actual double-choir textures, all suggesting strong Venetian influences. His Neuer teutscher Lieder I. Theil contains 23 songs for four voices, nearly all secular, with dedications to various members of the Austrian nobility who had joined together in singing them. Lagkhner's choice of texts, taken from the Ambras songbook (settings by composers such as Forster, H.L. Hassler, Regnart and Eccard), links him to the German songwriting tradition of Hassler's time.

Lago, Giovanni del. See DEL LAGO, GIOVANNI.

Lagoya, Alexandre (b Alexandria, 21 June 1929). French guitarist of Greek-Italian parentage. He began studying guitar at the age of eight in the Alexandria Conservatory. He gave his first public recital at 13 and five years later moved to Paris, where he continued his studies at the Ecole Normale de Musique and met several important composers. In 1950 he met Ida Presti at Segovia's summer course in Siena; they married in 1952. Thereafter they abandoned their successful solo careers and devoted themselves to establishing a duo that set new standards for the medium. After Ida Presti's premature death in 1967, Lagoya resumed his solo career, continued to direct the annual summer school in Nice (a task previously shared with Presti) and in 1969 became professor of guitar at the Paris Conservatoire, retiring in the mid-1990s. He continues to perform and make recordings.

JOHN W. DUARTE

Lagrange, Joseph Louis, Comte (b Turin, 25 Jan 1736; d Paris, 10 April 1813). French mathematician and physicist. He was largely self-trained and was encouraged by Euler and d'Alembert, whose protégé he became. He held positions in Berlin (from 1766) and Paris (from 1787). He is remembered as an acoustician for his work in 1759 on the transverse vibrations of the taut, massless cord loaded by n weights, equally spaced. He is credited with being the first to represent the string in this way and to calculate its normal mode patterns and frequencies, and for having established Euler's solution for the continuous monochord as being the result of taking the limit as n tends to infinity. In fact the discrete model was a very old one, and Lagrange's work on it is a straightforward extension of Euler's; further, as d'Alembert pointed out, Lagrange's passage to the limit is fallacious. In 1788 Lagrange showed how to determine in principle the normal modes of any discrete system in small oscillation about a stable position of equilibrium. In acoustics, as in many other domains, Lagrange's work closely follows Euler. It is Lagrange's chief merit to have been the only man of his day to master Euler's discoveries and methods as soon as they appeared, so that he was often able to extend Euler's results.

CLIVE GREATED

La Greca, Antonio ['Il Fardiola'] (b Palermo, 1631; d Palermo, 8 May 1668). Italian composer. His nickname was derived from his teacher, Filippo Fardiola, an incumbent of the Church at Palermo. In December 1653 La Greca is listed among the members of the Unione dei musici of Palermo. His Armonia sacra di vari motetti … libro primo op.1 (Palermo, 1657), discovered in the archives of St Paul's Cathedral of Malta, Mdina, in 1979, is for two to five voices with organ continuo. It contains settings of 21 Latin sacred texts, most of them extra-liturgical. Exultate, gaudete (for two sopranos and bass voice) and Lauda Sion (for five voices) include two violins, though in the latter they are optional. The music is sensitive to the meaning of the texts, with contrasts of metre (triple and duple), tempo (presto, allegro and largo) and style (arias, ariosos and recitatives). The harmony is rich, full of bold dissonances and modulations, and the melody is constantly enchanting, with unusual and surprising figurations.

La Grotte [La Crotte], Nicolas de (b 1530; *d c*1600). French keyboard player and composer. In 1557 he was organist and spinet player at Pau to Antoine de Bourbon, King of Navarre. In October 1558 he married and, though still attached to the court of Navarre, resided at Paris. After Antoine's death in 1562 he joined Costeley and Jean Dugué in the service of Henri de Valois, Duke of Anjou, and was appointed 'vallet de chambre et organiste ordinaire' in 1574 when the duke succeeded his brother Charles IX to become Henri III of France. He and Claude Le Jeune were paid 600 gold crowns for serving during the festivities for the wedding of the Duke of Joyeuse in September and October 1581. In 1584 he tested a new organ at St Germain-l'Auxerrois and his playing was praised by La Croix du Maine for its 'sweetness of execution, manual delicacy' and 'musical profundity'; the poet laureate Jean Dorat expressed similar sentiments in a Latin anagram, Tu solus organicus. In 1587 La Grotte petitioned the king for a sinecure, and between 1586 and 1589 made several applications to purchase land in the Corbeil district, near Paris.

The chansons in his 1569 collection reflect the contemporary preference of poets and humanists for monody; although the publication, in four partbooks, follows the standard format, the music was clearly conceived as melody and accompaniment – the three lower voices providing harmonic support – and seems more naturally suited to the arrangement for voice and lute issued under Le Roy's own name as airs de cour in 1571 (this includes all but the final piece of La Grotte's 1569 collection). Several of the melodies were also used in Jehan Chardavoine's monophonic Recueil des plus excellents chansons en forme de voix de ville (Paris, 1576). The declamatory rhythm of some of these pieces foreshadows the work of musicians in Baïf's circle and La Grotte demonstrated his interest in musique mesurée à l'antique by including four chansons mesurées (Il a menty, La belle Aronde, Lessemoy osu (Baïf) and Ma gente bergère) in a second collection, published in Paris in 1583. The distinction between air and chanson in the title of this collection refers only to strophic and non-strophic texts, among which are verses by Baïf and Belleau, religious texts by Desportes, du Bellay and Guéroult, two Italian poems and a long opening piece in five sections entitled Mascarades de Pionniers. La Grotte's own literary talent is evident in that he translated from Dorat's original Latin the prefatory verses addressed to Henri III in the 1583 volume. In view of the chronology, La Grotte seems more likely than Gombert, Millot or Guillaume NICOLAS to have written the chansons ascribed to 'Nicolas' in anthologies published between 1559 and 1578; these are generally more old-fashioned in style than La Grotte's collections of 1569 and 1583, but they include a few settings of the Pléiade poets (Ronsard, Du Bellay and Belleau) as well as older verse by Marot, Guéroult and others. In spite of his fame as an organist, only one of La Grotte's keyboard works survives – a four-part polyphonic fantasia on Rore's madrigal Ancor che col partire.

Lagudio, Paolo (fl 1563). Italian composer. His Primo libro di madrigali a cinque voci (Venice, 1563[10], incomplete) is dedicated from Naples. In addition to his own three madrigal pairs and a 21-stanza cycle, the book contains one madrigal by Ferrante Bucca. Such extended cycles as Lagudio's Quel antico mio were uncommon even in Rome, Venice and Verona where settings of entire canzoni were popular.

Laguerre [Lagarde, Legar, Legard, Le Garde, Legare, Leguar, Leguerre etc.], John (*b c*1700; d London, 28 March 1748). English baritone and painter. The various spellings of his name in playbills, advertisements and cast-lists have caused much confusion, with some writers asserting that more than one person is involved. Laguerre first appeared in Italian opera, having a minor role in Handel's Radamisto (1720). He then joined John Rich's company, where between 1721 and 1740 he sang in pantomimes, afterpieces, ballad operas and burlesques. He sang again for Handel, as Curio in Giulio Cesare (1724), his English theatre roles being taken by other singers on Italian opera nights. His most popular roles were Hob in Flora and Gaffer Gubbins in The Dragon of Wantley. He sang Corydon in the first public performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea in March 1731. In 1724 he married the dancer and actress Mary Rogeir; they always worked together and after her death in 1739 his career declined. In 1741 he was imprisoned for debt, but was allowed to sing in his benefit performance on 23 April. In 1746 he was taken on by Rich as a scene painter. He had published engravings of theatrical subjects, having been trained by his father, the French-born mural painter Louis Laguerre, who died at the theatre on John's first benefit night in 1721. 'Honest Jack Laguerre' had a reputation as a wit, a mimic and an amusing companion.

Laguerre, Marie-Joséphine (b Paris, 1755; d Paris, 14 Feb 1783). French soprano. She joined the Opéra as a chorister in 1771–2 and in 1776 took the title roles in La Borde's Adèle de Ponthieu and Gluck's Alceste. A pure-voiced and expressive singer, she shared leading roles with Rosalie Levasseur from 1778, and created the title role in Floquet's Hellé (1779), Sangaride in Piccinni's Atys (1780), Iphigenia in Piccinni's Iphigénie en Tauride (1781) and the Countess in Grétry's La double épreuve (1782). Her early death was apparently the result of loose living; at the second performance of Piccinni's Iphigénie, she was incoherent through drink and was imprisoned until the following performance.

La Guerre, Michel de (b Paris, *c*1606; d Paris, 12 Nov 1679). French organist, lutenist and composer. At the age of 14 he succeeded Charles Racquet, organist at Notre Dame, Paris, and on 1 January 1633 was appointed organist of the Ste Chapelle, where he remained until his death. According to the Ste Chapelle records, he was also treasurer from 1661. He married Marguerite Trépagne and had ten children: Jérôme succeeded him as organist of the Ste Chapelle, holding the post until about 1739; Marin, who was married to Elisabeth Jacquet, acted as substitute for his brother between 1698 and 1704. Michel de La Guerre was considered by Jean Loret (La muze historique, 19 December 1654) to be 'a very excellent master of the lute'; he performed at musical gatherings arranged by the organist Pierre de la Barre and accompanied the famous singer Anne de la Barre. He is regarded as the creator of the French pastorale: Le triomphe de l'Amour, a setting of a poem by Charles de Beys, was performed at the Louvre on 22 January 1655 and then at the Théâtre du Palais-Royal on 26 March 1657; the music is lost. In about 1661 La Guerre dedicated to Louis XIV a collection of his settings of Oeuvres en vers de divers autheurs, mis en musique, among them a Dialogue sur l'alliance de la France et de l'Espagne in which each allegorical figure sings in his or her own language. The music of these, too, is lost.

Laḥjī, Muḥammad Faḍl al- (b 1922, al-Hawta, British Protectorate of South Arabia [now Yemen]; d 1967). Arab singer and 'ūd player. His life was closely linked to that of his patron, Prince Aḥmad Faḍl al-'Abdalī, known as 'the Commandant' (al-Komandān). Before the Komandān, the music of the Lahij region near Aden was confined to popular songs and instruments (the double clarinet, the lyre and percussion). In the 1930s, young artists influenced by Egyptian song discovered the 'ūd (short-necked lute). As an alternative to the other urban musical genres of the Yemen, which derived from Sana'a and Hadramawt, the Komandān invented a new style known as laḥjī by adapting his poetry to traditional melodies; he later composed new melodies and provided patronage for young composers. The laḥjī style was the first 'urban' musical genre of the Yemen in the contemporary sense, making its mark throughout the Yemen together with the polyrhythmic sharḥ dance. Many laḥjī recordings were released in Aden during the 1940s by the al-Tāj al-Adanī company, and the laḥjī became particularly well known in the Persian Gulf under the name of 'adanī. Al-Laḥjī added to this repertory new songs such as Yā ward yā kādhī ('O rose, O kādhī, pears and apricots'). In many of his melodies it is difficult to tell the traditional from the new elements and to distinguish the contributions of al-Laḥjī from those of the Komandān; al-Laḥjī's work retains the pentatonic scale of popular origin which later became blurred in the work of artists such as Faysal 'Alawī. Al-Laḥjī pursued a traditional career, providing music for weddings; he joined the Musical Club of Lahij in 1955 and the Musical Club of the South in 1957, both of which associations played a part in the revival of Yemeni nationalism. He died prematurely, assassinated in 1967.

JEAN LAMBERT

La Harpe [Delaharpe], Jean François de (b Paris, 20 Nov 1739; d Paris, 11 Feb 1803). French man of letters. He wrote several tragedies, of which Le comte de Warwick (1763) was the most successful, but he is chiefly remembered for his didactic and critical works. These include the Cours de littérature in 16 volumes (1799–1805), in which he holds a special place for French librettists of the 17th and 18th centuries, and an Eloge de Racine (1772). A dogmatic critic with little understanding of music, he joined with Marmontel to support the Italians against Gluck, and particularly favoured Sacchini; his virulent attack on Armide in the Journal de politique et de littérature (5 October 1777) was ridiculed by Gluck himself in the Journal de Paris (12 October 1777) and by La Harpe's colleague J.B.A. Suard using the pseudonym 'L'anonyme de Vaugirard'. His Correspondance littéraire (1774–91, published 1801–7), a manuscript periodical similar to Grimm's, though less extensive, is a valuable informal record of the period. His Chant des triomphes de la République française was set to music by Le Sueur in 1794.

JULIAN RUSHTON/MANUEL COUVREUR

La Hèle [Hele], George de (b Antwerp, 1547; d Madrid, 27 Aug 1586). Flemish composer, active in Spain. He received his early musical training under Antoine Barbé (i) at the church of Our Lady in Antwerp. It is also possible that he spent some time as a choirboy at the collegiate church at Soignies. In 1560 he was among a group of choirboys who went from the Low Countries to Madrid to serve in the chapel of Philip II, then under the direction of Pierre de Manchicourt. From the preface to his Octo missae, we know that La Hèle remained in the service of the king for ten years at this time. Towards the end of this period, possibly for three or four years, he was enrolled in the University of Alcalá, while continuing to have his name inscribed in the roster of the choir in order to receive its benefits. In 1570 La Hèle returned to the Low Countries to study at the University of Leuven, probably reading theology. While never fully ordained a priest, there is evidence that he received minor orders before discontinuing his theological studies.

La Hèle became choirmaster at St Rombouts in Mechelen in 1572, and about 1574 went to the cathedral at Tournai in a similar capacity. In 1576 he won two prizes for his compositions at a contest in honour of St Cecilia at Évreux. He was awarded second prize, a golden ring adorned with a silver harp, for the motet Nonne Deo subiecta erit anima mea; and also gained third prize, a golden ring ornamented with a silver lute, for his chanson Mais voyez mon cher esmoy. In 1578 Christopher Plantin of Antwerp printed the composer's most important work, his Octo missae.

Philip II designated La Hèle master of the royal chapel on 15 September 1580. However, despite numerous efforts by the king to hasten his journey to Madrid, La Hèle does not seem to have arrived there until over a year and a half after this appointment. He was much concerned with the condition of the musical repertory he found at the chapel, and greatly enlarged it with music by Clemens non Papa, Palestrina, Guerrero, Morales and Manchicourt, as well as with some of his own works. In 1585 Philip II travelled to Zaragoza for the marriage of his daughter Catherine with Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy. La Hèle wrote a highly successful motet for this occasion. On this same journey, while at Monzón, he conducted a festival performance in which the choir of his own chapel and those from Castile, Aragon and Portugal sang.

Because he had received minor orders, La Hèle was eligible to hold ecclesiastical benefices. Philip II liberally provided him with several throughout his life. However, La Hèle lost all of these through his marriage, which seems to have taken place shortly before he died, probably during his final illness. On 16 June 1586 he made a will which contains the only mention of his wife, formerly Madelena Guabaelaraoen, who was appointed an executor. He died on 27 August 1586 in the parish of St Nicholas in Madrid.

George de La Hèle's Octo missae was the first of Christopher Plantin's few music printings. For its publication Plantin had an elaborate frontispiece specially engraved, which later served for his other music publications (see LOW COUNTRIES, fig.3). The music fount used was also specially prepared. For the first letter of the text at the beginning of each part of each mass, majuscules were employed which had originally been intended for an antiphoner, commissioned by Philip II but never printed. The high-quality paper on which these eight masses were printed had also been purchased for this antiphoner. The beautiful workmanship of the Plantin press on the Octo missae makes it a model of printing artistry for the period. The work was published in choirbook format, its actual size being 54 cm by 38 cm. The retail selling price of the volume was an expensive 18 florins, and by the terms of the printing contract La Hèle was required to purchase 40 copies at a reduced price. The account books of Plantin show that the publication sold well, and many copies survive today. La Hèle's Octo missae comprises the masses on Benedicta es coelorum regina (7vv), Fremuit spiritus Jesu (6vv), Gustate et videte (5vv), In convertendo Dominus (5vv), Nigra sum sed formosa (5vv), Oculi omnium in te sperant Domine (5vv), Praeter rerum seriem (7vv) and Quare tristis es (6vv). The first and seventh are based on motets by Josquin; the second, third, sixth and eighth on motets by Lassus; the fourth on the motet by Rore and the fifth on the motet by Crecquillon. La Hèle's motet Asperges me precedes the masses in this collection.

La Hèle's skill as a composer is best demonstrated through the parody technique of his masses. Melodic, harmonic and rhythmic elements from the polyphonic model are ingeniously reworked, in both easily recognizable and cleverly disguised variations, in such a way as to elevate the contrapuntal level of the original. La Hèle drew only on motets, avoiding secular models as inappropriate to the divine service. All his models were composed by established composers.

The Octo missae and the one motet and one chanson previously mentioned are the only extant works of George de La Hèle. That he did write others is verified by the lists of music copied into the repertory of the royal chapel of Philip II. The lists for 1585 contain a Credo (8vv); a motet In illo tempore (8vv); a Kyrie for Paschal time (5vv); a Kyrie for Paschal time (6vv); two Passion settings (both 4vv); a Lamentatio Jeremie (5vv); another for eight voices; the motet Domine tu mihi lavas pedes (8vv); and Egredientum (4vv); all by La Hèle. Presumably these, and probably more of his works, were lost when the library of the royal chapel was burnt in 1734.

La Hire, Philippe de (b Paris, 18 March 1640; d Paris, 21 April 1718). French astronomer, mathematician and physicist. He was the son of the painter Laurent de la Hire. In 1678 he was admitted a member of the Académie Royale des Sciences in Paris as an astronomer, and subsequently he taught mathematics at both the Collège de France (from 1682) and the Académie Royale d'Architecture (of which he was a founder-member in 1687). Among the many works by this celebrated and productive scientist are several essays devoted to research into the nature of sound, which appear in the publications of the French scientific academy. The most noteworthy features of these investigations are his concerns with partial vibrations as determinants of timbre, with the acoustical differences between the vibration of cylinders, solid bodies and strings, and with the effect on a resultant sound of such factors as the elastic quality of a vibrating body, its relative moisture content and the means by which it is set into vibration.

ALBERT COHEN

La Houssaye [Housset], Pierre(-Nicolas) (b Paris, 11 April 1735; d Paris, 1818). French violinist, conductor and composer. Originally called Housset, he studied the violin in the 1740s with J.-A. Piffet. Shortly after 1750 his brilliant performance of a Tartini sonata at a gathering of eminent violinists created the opportunity to study with Pagin, a pupil of Tartini. La Houssaye was later employed by the Count of Clermont, then by the Prince of Monaco, with whom he travelled to Italy, probably in about 1753. On arrival in Padua he received a few lessons from Tartini. He was employed briefly at the court of Filippo, Duke of Parma, where he studied composition with Traetta, but he soon returned to Padua for more lessons with Tartini. During his stay of about 15 years in Italy he became an excellent violinist and conductor.

In 1768 or later La Houssaye left Italy for London, probably passing through Paris. Precisely how long he remained there and what he did while there remains unknown. Fétis and most subsequent sources have reported that he directed the orchestra of the Italian Opera in the 1770s, but Pericaud thought this improbable. McVeigh states that he was a soloist at several of the King's Theatre oratorios in 1770, and that he may have led the Bach-Abel concerts in 1770 and 1771. By 1776 La Houssaye had returned to Paris, and in 1777 he was named conductor and leader of the Concert Spirituel under Legros. (In 1778 Mozart, after observing La Houssaye's particularly disastrous rehearsal of his symphony K297/300*a*, wrote that he would be tempted to remove the violin from La Houssaye's hands and conduct himself if the performance were equally bad; but the performance on 18 June was a great success.) In 1781 La Houssaye became conductor and leader of the Comédie-Italienne orchestra but remained a violinist at the Concert Spirituel until at least 1788. He also played in the highly respected Concert des Amateurs. From 1791 he shared with Joseph Lefebvre the position of orchestra director at the Théâtre Feydeau, but the merger with the Théâtre Favart in 1801 resulted in his dismissal. After the Paris Conservatoire opened in 1795, he was appointed a violin teacher, a post he retained until 1802. To maintain a livelihood, he played second violin in the Opéra orchestra and taught privately until 1813, when deafness and age forced him to retire. His final five years were spent in poverty.

La Houssaye was regarded as a master of the violin by those who heard him, including Fétis and Viotti; his one remaining collection of compositions, Sei sonate for violin and bass, op.1 (Paris, *c*1774), supports this evaluation, demanding great proficiency in double stops and calling for notes in the extreme upper register. A virtuoso violin concerto attributed to him in another hand matches the style of Tartini's second period; if authentic, it was probably composed before his years in Italy. According to Fétis, La Houssaye wrote other works for the violin, the manuscripts of which are lost: 12 'church' concertos, seven books of sonatas and three books of duos. His only other known work is a comic opera, Les amours de Coucy, performed at the Théâtre de Monsieur on 22 August 1790.

JEFFREY COOPER

Le Hye [née Rousseau], Louise-Geneviève de (b Charenton, 8 March 1810; d Paris, 17 Nov 1838). French pianist, organist and composer. She was a collateral descendant of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. A child prodigy, she studied first with her father, Charles-Louis Rousseau, then with Louis-Joseph Saint-Amans; when she was 11 she was admitted to the Paris Conservatoire. According to Fétis, she was invited in 1830 by the Conservatoire director, Luigi Cherubini, to teach harmony to a class of young girls, and took the solo part in her fantasy for organ and orchestra in a Conservatoire performance on 10 April 1831. She married shortly thereafter and gave up her appointment to move to Cambrai, but returned to Paris at the end of 1834 and resumed teaching. In 1835 her dramatic choral work Le songe de la religieuse was performed at the Hôtel de Ville. She published a number of works (among them a set of variations on 'La muette de Portici' under the pseudonym 'M. Léon Saint-Amans fils'), including a duo for horn and piano, a set of variations for piano and string quartet, and some settings of poems by her husband, but ill-health prevented her from realizing many of her projects. She died at the age of 28 leaving two young children. Her Méthode d'orgue expressif and collection of Six mélodies italiennes (dedicated to the Princess Belgioioso) were published posthumously, while other works remained in manuscript, including masses, scènes dramatiques, a piano method and études.

JULIE ANNE SADIE

Lai (Fr.). An extended song form cultivated particularly in the 13th and 14th centuries. The stanzas – if the poem can be divided in that way – are each in a different form and therefore have different music. Though the number of surviving examples is small compared with the total extent of medieval song these works occupy a special position for several reasons: the very irregularity of the poetic form led to large metrical and rhyming patterns that have caused the lai and its German equivalent the Leich to be described as the major showpieces of medieval lyric poetry; and there is much truth in Spanke's useful distinction (1938) between songs that are primarily metrical in their formal concept (i.e. nearly all medieval strophic song) and those that are primarily musical (the lai and the sequence), a distinction that almost inevitably brings with it the suggestion that the lai and related forms represent by far the earliest surviving attempts at continuous extended musical composition outside the liturgy. In general it is true to say that in the 13th century the form could be extremely free, with highly irregular rhyme schemes and lines of uneven length, but that in the 14th century lais became enormously longer, with the French tradition developing a standard pattern with each stanza following a double-versicle scheme (often refined to an apparent quadruple-versicle) and a 12-stanza form in which the first and last could be related musically or even have the same music at different pitches.

1. Terminology and origins. Many different extended forms in medieval (and later) poetry are encompassed by the word 'lai' and related words in other European languages. The form described above is more strictly called the lyric lai (or lai lyrique) to distinguish it from the narrative lai (or lai breton), a long poem normally in octosyllabic rhyming couplets and often associated with stories of the Arthurian cycle.

The narrative lai was most elegantly described by Chaucer's Franklin:

> Thise olde gentil Bretouns in hir dayes
> Of diverse aventures maden layes,
> Rymeyed in hir firste Briton tonge;
> Which layes with hir instrumentz they songe,
> Or elles redden hem for hir plesaunce.

In French this genre saw its first success with Marie de France, who apparently worked in England and whose 12 narrative lais date from the years after 1160, though she claimed they were adapted from Breton originals that are now lost; but it continued well into the 15th century: after 1415 Pierre de Nesson called his poem in that form lamenting the French defeat at Agincourt the Lay de la guerre. Though the narrative lai, like much other narrative verse, was evidently sung, certainly in its earlier history, no music for it survives: only the presence of empty staves above a manuscript of the Lai de Graelent (F-Pn fr.2168) and a lost manuscript of the lais of Marie de France (see Maillard, 1963, p.66) witness that this music may have been written down. (See also CHANSON DE GESTE.)

Even within the terminology 'lyric lai' there are poems that cannot be described as lais according to the definition adopted for this article. Several poems carrying the title 'lai' are found inserted in longer narratives: particularly famous examples of this category appear in the Roman de Perceforest and the Roman de Tristan en prose. For the latter there is even music, surviving notably in A-Wn 2542 (listed below); but these are mostly simple strophic songs, quatrains with the musical scheme aabc (the three melodies in F-Pn fr.776 have no such clear design), though with the peculiarity that their music is fully written out for all stanzas of the poem. Tannhäuser's Lude Leich (D-Mbs Cgm 4997, ff.72–73*v*) is also isostrophic. More difficult to classify are the two 'lais' attributed by Beck to Charles d'Anjou and described by Stäblein (1975) as merely a series of single-stanza songs.

The word itself is hard to pin down and has been variously explained. One possibility is that it derives from the Latin laicus, implying a secular equivalent of the sequence. Intriguingly the narrative Palamede says that the lai has its name because it leaves behind (laissier) all other lyric forms. Another theory traces it back to the Low Latin leudus, found as early as Venantius Fortunatus (*c*550) and meaning a vernacular song in Latin metre: this is probably a latinization of a germanic word (perhaps leuthaz*, though the German word Leich is thought to derive from laik*; asterisks in this context denote hypothetical roots) and is glossed in one manuscript with the Old High German Uuinileodos (singer); the later Latin laudes and the Irish loîd (or laîd) are evidently related. The Irish word (meaning blackbird's song) can be documented from the mid-9th century and may go back further; since the 16th century it has been used to mean any poem, but particularly songs related to the epic of Finn. There is much evidence in favour of Irish origin for the form, a theory supported by Aarburg and by Maillard, who showed how the rhythmic interest of early Irish poetry may have influenced the lai ('Lai, Leich', 1973, pp.326ff); but no music survives to document this and nothing in Irish poetic structure can be linked directly with the musical form that appeared in France about 1200.

The earliest recorded French uses of the word 'lai', those of Wace in his Roman de Brut (*c*1155: 'lais et notes/lais de vieles, lais de rotes/lais de harpes et de frestels'), describe instrumental melody, but this is by no means the rule for other early references: Wolf (1841, pp.4ff) showed that the word 'lai' in English or Old French often meant no more than 'song'.

1. How the lady made the lover read the lai he had composed: miniature from the Machaut MS 'C', after 1350 (F-Pn fr.1586, f.28v)

Just as the word 'lai' itself had and still has several meanings beyond and around the specific musico-poetic form that is the subject of this article, so also many other words cover ranges of meaning that include that of the lyric lai.

(i) Descort. Derived from the Latin discordia, descort was the standard Provençal word for lai and was carried into Old French as well as into Italian, where the word discordio appears describing a poem of Jacopo da Lentino. There has been some disagreement as to the differences between descort and lai, with Wolf (1841) and Jeanroy (1901) pioneering the opinion that there was none and Stäblein (1975) suggesting that descort was merely a later and more sophisticated name preferred by the trouvères. (An excellent and full survey of the dispute appears in Baum, 1971; see also P. Bec, La lyrique française au Moyen Age (XIIe-XIIIe siecles), i, Paris, 1977, pp.199ff.) For musical purposes the two probably were identical since the confusion appears to lie mainly in the range of other materials encompassed by the word descort: though primarily designating the same form (or forms) as the lyric lai, it is also used for a poem whose stanzas disagree in some other way (e.g. Raimbaut de Vaqeiras's descort Ara quan vei verdejar has five isometric stanzas but their discordia lies in the fact that each is in a different language) and for a poem whose subject matter is discordance, disagreement or most characteristically severe disappointment in love (this last explaining the definition of the descort in the Provençal Doctrina de comprendre dictatz). In this context it might be worth noting that Konrad von Würzburg's second Leich (for which no music survives) repeatedly describes itself as a Streit ('contest').

It must be added, however, that some scholars see substantial differences between the lai and the descort. Maillard (1963), starting from the nomenclature found in the sources, divided the extant lyric lais into lais and descorts, but his efforts (pp.128ff) to define the difference are not entirely convincing. His suggestion (pp.143–4) that the essence of the descort was in its poetical form occasionally departing from its musical form seems questionable in view of the relative frequency of troubadour strophic songs whose musical form is at variance with their poetic form, and the extremely small number of Provençal lais (or descorts) with surviving music against which the theory can be tested (see also Maillard, 1971). Yet another opinion as to the difference is offered by Gennrich (1932, pp.138ff). Although the matter is still a subject of considerable dispute, this article has been prepared in the belief that these distinctions are artificial.

(ii) Leich or leih. The Middle High German word for lai. Kuhn (1952) argued that the earlier form was laik*, a dance-song (but see also CAROL), and there is much evidence that the word 'leih' was originally used to denote a melody: so Browne (1956) gave examples of a sancleich (sung Leich), a herafleih (harp Leich) and a keraleih (sorrowful Leich). By the late 12th century it seems that 'Leich' could mean any sacred poem, and the Monk of Salzburg (*c*1400) used the word to describe his sequence contrafacta; moreover, the word appears in manuscripts of the 12th and 13th centuries as a designation of psalms (D-Mbs Cgm 17 and A-Gu 204), perhaps because King David was reputed to have sung them to the harp (harafleich). But otherwise the word is perhaps the most specific of all those related to the form discussed in this article: it was not used for narrative poems and seems to have had very little currency for other purposes. Since Spanke many German philologists have preferred to form the plural artificially as Leichs (since Leiche, the more correct plural, also means 'corpse').

(iii) Note, nota, notula. One or other of these words is used by Johannes de Grocheio and in several French lais apparently describing lai form. In the title of the 'Note Martinet' (the lai J'ai trouvé), 'note' may be merely the designation of the melody or perhaps more particularly of the musical and poetic scheme (see also TON (i)). Maillard cited several instances of its apparently referring to the melody of a lai; but sometimes it meant simply the melody of any song. The word is discussed more fully by Gennrich (1932, pp.167ff).

(iv) Estampie, estampida, ostampida, stantipes, stampita. The trouvère manuscript GB-Ob Douce 308 contains a group of 19 poems in lai form having the title 'estampie', but none of them has music. Among the Provençal repertory, the poem Kalenda maya by Raimbaut de Vaqeiras describes itself as an estampida but is isostrophic with each stanza following the pattern aabb[1]cc[1]. Instrumental pieces (perhaps dances) of the 13th and 14th centuries have the title and are in double-versicle sections with refrains at the end of each stanza and with ouvert and clos endings. The form is mentioned by Johannes de Grocheio, by the author of Las leys d'amors (1328) and as late as Michael Praetorius; see ESTAMPIE.

(v) Ductia. Another form mentioned by Johannes de Grocheio and closely related to the estampie: it has

2. Prisoner's song from 'Liber de antiquis legibus' (Corporation of London Records Office 49A, ff.160v–161r); the melody of the Latin 'Planctus ante nescia' is underlaid with the French text 'Eyns ne soy ke pleynte fu' and the English text 'Ar ne kuthe ich sorghe non' double-versicle sections with refrains but differs from most such forms in having isometric stanzas; see DUCTIA.

(vi) Caribo, caribetto (Provençal: garip). An Italian word used primarily for instrumental versions of the form though also implying dance music. It was mentioned together with the nota and the stampita by the theorist Francesco da Barberino (1310). As a name for a kind of dance-song it appears in Dante's Purgatorio (xxxi.132); and it describes a poem in lai form by Giacobo Pugliese. There is some disagreement as to whether the word derives from the Greek charis or from the name of an Arabic instrument. (See Appel, 1887, p.224.)

(vii) Consonium. Mentioned by Francesco da Barberino as the text for a caribus, a nota or a stampita (see Gennrich, 1932, p.163).

(viii) Ensalada, ensaladilla. Rengifo's Arte poetica española (1592) described the form in terms strikingly similar to earlier descriptions of the lai and descort. In surviving Portuguese and Spanish music the ENSALADA is not known before the mid-16th century; on earlier traces of the poetic form see d'Heur (1968) and G. Tavani: Repertorio metrico della lirica galego-portoghese, Officina romanica, vii (Rome, 1967).

(ix) Sequence, prose, conductus, planctus, versus. These are the Latin forms that include material that could be described in Spanke's terms as 'musikalisch primär'. Ferdinand Wolf's theories (1841) on the substantial identity of sequence and lyric lai were strongly opposed by Jeanroy and Aubry (1901), who asserted a little too absolutely that all sequences were built on an unvarying double-versicle pattern – a pattern that can rarely be seen in the 13th-century lai. Subsequent studies of the sequence (see SEQUENCE (i)) may not restore Wolf's original position, but they do suggest that both forms were initially less strict than they later became and that although the surviving history of the sequence's development belongs to a time nearly four centuries earlier than that of the lai the two have much in common and even share some music.

Gautier de Coincy's Hui enfantés is a straight contrafactum of the Christmas sequence Letabundus which also served as source for the Anglo-Norman drinking-song Or hi parra; and it may be an evasion of the real issue to omit these works from considerations of the lai, dismissing them as mere contrafacta. Godefroy de St Victor's Planctus ante nescia provided the melody and the form for the French lai Eyns ne soy ke pleynte fu, the English 'translation', Ar ne kuthe ich sorghe non (both in Corporation of London Records Office, Liber de antiquis legibus, ff.160*v*–161*v*; fig.2) and the Hungarian poem Volék sirolm tudotlan. There are several other such examples in which the Latin original is obviously far earlier and served as a model: the fullest study is that of Spanke (1936); Handschin (1954) gave good reason for thinking that both sequence and lai have their roots in the Celtic tradition; and Stäblein (1954, 1962) showed how a close examination of the Latin precursors can throw important light on the history of the lai.

Questions of definition are made even more difficult by the inserted 'Amen' and 'Evovae' phrases in lais by Ernoul le vielle de Gastinois and Leichs by Frauenlob, perhaps just as indications of modality but possibly suggesting some liturgical function (see Maillard, 1963, pp.310ff; März, 1988; Shields, 1988). Perhaps the most interesting contrafacta, however, merit inclusion on their own account: indeed, Heinrich Laufenberg's two Salve regina parodies have no connection with the metrical scheme of the original because they set the melismatic melody syllabically.

These works all belong in a kind of no-man's-land between the lai and the sequence, but they should not allow any confusion as to the fundamental separateness of the two forms. The classic sequence has a compactness and clarity of design that are entirely different from either the rambling motivic dialectic of the 13th-century lai or the closely defined stanza and repetition patterns of the form in the 14th century. Certain aspects of the essence of both are more easily understood if sequence and lai are seen as the same form, but many others make sense only if the two are considered separately.

2. POETIC FORM. Maillard (1963) provided an extensive listing of extant poems in the lai form: far fewer than half of them survive with music. Since musical form was at the time almost invariably determined by poetic form and since there are some discussions of it in the poetical theory, it is in literary terms that the essential features of the form's history are most easily summarized.

Jeanroy (1901) mentioned the difficulty of being certain in identifying the stanzaic divisions of the 13th-century lyric lai: the poems are often too irregular to permit unambiguous analysis and the illuminated initials that normally begin a stanza in the manuscripts are sometimes clearly misplaced in lais, as though the early scribes were as confused as anybody else. To put it another way, the early lai is often a mere series of poetic lines, mostly brief and all rhyming with some other line, sometimes easily divisible into larger sections but not always giving any clear clue as to formal shape. An extreme example is the beginning of Comencerai by Thibaut IV (for the music see ex.1):

Comencerai / a fere un lai / de la meillor /
    forment m'esmai / que trop parai / fet de dolor, /
    dont mi chant torront a plor.
Mere virge savoree / se vos faitez demoree / de proier le haut segnor / bien doi avoir grant paor / du deable, du felon / que en la noire prison / nos velt mener / dont nus ne peut eschaper;

Jeanroy, surveying the 30 13th-century lais known to him (a few more have since been discovered), listed a range of six to 19 stanzas, of two to 56 lines comprising two to 11 syllables but tending to favour the shorter lines that are in general a special characteristic of the lai throughout its history.

Few lais are quite as irregular as Thibaut's Comencerai, and one of the most prominent features of the lai is normally the principle of responsion, or repeated material. 'Lesser responsion' is the immediate or almost immediate repetition of a metrical or poetic scheme in the manner of the 'classical' double-versicle sequence: the repeated metre and rhyme scheme normally bring with them a musical repeat. But in the lai, particularly in the early stages of its history, the scheme of a single line or a couplet will often be repeated several times before new material is introduced, and this brings in its train the multifold repetition of short melodic fragments.

In the 14th-century lai lesser responsion became customary throughout, normally in the form of regular fourfold responsion which was given music with alternating ouvert and clos cadences. Thus the 11th stanza of Machaut's Le lay de l'ymage runs:

> Riens ne desir / tant com li servir / a plaisir. / Mi desir sont la jour et nuit, > pour desservir, / en lieu de merir, / li veir, / li oir: a ce Amours me duit.
> Mieus vueil languir / pour li, sans mentir, / et morir / que joir > d'autre; c'est le fruit > dont soustenir / me vueil et norir. / La metir / la querir > vueil tout mon deduit.

'Greater responsion' entails repeating the scheme of a larger section later within the lai. Maillard ('Lai, Leich', 1973, p.335) gave the following formal analysis (others are possible) of the long 'Lai de l'ancien et du nouveau testament': ABCDEFG EHIJ EHIJ EIJ EIJ E AB. Such greater responsion is also found in the sequence (see DOUBLE CURSUS). In lais of the 14th century it had reduced itself to a single case: the last stanza normally repeated the verse scheme of the first, but here the music was often transposed to another pitch, thereby both breaking the convention of the same verse scheme having the same music and also anticipating the sonata form recapitulation idea in many of its essential features by some 400 years.

Spanke (1938), in making what is still the most comprehensive attempt to analyse and categorize the 13th-century lais, was particularly reluctant to postulate any 'development' of form within the lai, asserting that the strictest poetic form in Machaut was already known in the 12th century. There was merely an extraordinarily wide range of structures, from the almost shapeless, such as Thibaut's Comencerai, through the heavily repetitive but rambling, such as the two lais of Ernoul de Gastinois, to the most painstakingly balanced lai with strictly paired lesser responsions, such as the 'Lai du chevrefeuille' or Puis qu'en chantant. On the other hand, it is also true to say that of the 46 Provençal poems and 109 Old French poems inventoried by Maillard (not all are strictly lais within the terms of this article and many are lost), remarkably few have 12 stanzas, the number favoured by Machaut and increasingly adhered to through the 14th century. So also, the earliest theorist to discuss the form at any length, Guilhem Molinier in the first version of Las leys d'amors (1328), was suitably vague in his definition, saying that it 'can have as many stanzas as a vers, that is to say five or ten, these stanzas being singulars, and distinct in rhyme, in music and in text; and they can each have the same metre or different metre'.

Only one of the Roman de Fauvel lais has 12 stanzas, but nearly all of Machaut's are in that form, later described by Eustache Deschamps (Art de dictier, 1392), who himself wrote 12 such poems. He described the lai as long and difficult to write ('c'est une chose longue et malaisee a faire et trouver'), having 12 double stanzas of 16, 18, 20 or 24 lines, each stanza with a different rhyme except the last, which should repeat that of the first without however repeating any of the actual rhyme words. He also said that lais were fairly common: in view of his own output and the continued cultivation of this intricate and elaborate form by Froissart (who gave a similar definition in his Prison amoureuse, ll.3483–514), Oton de Granson, Christine de Pizan, Alain Chartier and Georges Chastellain, this is no surprise.

An even further increase in the rigidity of the form is apparent from the Regles de la seconde rhetorique (*c*1411–32) which gives a brief history of the form, according special honours to Philippe de Vitry and to Machaut (see §4 below). It describes the lai as having '12 stanzas of which the first and the last are similar in form and rhyme while the other ten are each individual in these respects; but each stanza must have four quarters'. Baudet Herenc (1432, ed. in Langlois, 1902, pp.166ff) was even more restrictive as to the length of each line and the permissible rhyme schemes.

Poetic theory on the subject in the later 15th century and after represents a falling away at the edges. Deschamps had described and exemplified a double lai with 38 stanzas, but for Molinet a century later the form had become so rigid that double lai was merely a lai with 16 lines in the stanza rather than the 12 lines that had by then become almost mandatory: the 12-line form most favoured was that with the rhyme scheme aab aab bba bba, often called the petit lai de contradiction but also sometimes called virelai – a name that is particularly confusing in musical contexts because the form has nothing at all to do with the standard VIRELAI of polyphonic song. At the same time a distinction evolved between the petit lai or commun lai with only one stanza and the full-size grand lai: a late example of a 'commun lay' in the Jardin de plaisance (Paris, *c*1501) comprises four stanzas with the same metre and rhyme scheme (that described above as 'virelai') and commends Chartier as a writer of lais. Thomas Sebillet's Art poëtique françois (Lyons, 2/1556) mentioned the lai and the virelai as an afterthought, declaring both to be obsolete. One particularly interesting late example of a lai (discussed in Giacchetti, 1973) is in fact a connected 'cycle' of seven poems in the following sequence of forms: rondeau, fatras, virelai, fatras, ballade, fatras, rondeau; but it describes itself as being a lai, and is a lai in having each stanza in a different form from the last; moreover, Willaert (1992) notes a similar poem-sequence elsewhere in the same romance, Ysaÿe le triste, and remarks that comparable sequences can be found among the Dutch poems in the Hague Chansonnier (NL-DHk 128 D 2) of about 1400.

3. 'Tant me sui de dire teu', one of the 'lais' inserted in the 'Roman de Tristan en prose', c1225–30 (F-Pn fr.776, f.271v)

3. THE LAI BEFORE 1300. The earliest lai repertories with music are most simply described in terms of their manuscript sources. Peripheral to the main subject of this article are the inserts in the Roman de Tristan en prose (*c*1225–30, found particularly in A-Wn 2542; for a version from a different manuscript see fig.3). These are a series of simple stanzaic songs, very much in the musical and poetic style of the trouvère tradition at the time. Several of them are entitled 'lai' and they are the only surviving music with that title actually associated with Arthurian or narrative material: for these reasons they are included in the checklist below and must be considered in any study of the subject so long as the question of definition remains unsolved. But nothing in their poetry or their music suggests any connections with the genre under consideration here.

The main collection of true 13th-century lais is in the Chansonnier de Noailles (F-Pn fr.12615) which contains 17, ten of them together (fig.4). Smaller quantities of music, less clearly organized, appear in the Chansonnier du Roi (F-Pn fr.844), in F-Pn fr.845 and in the Wiener Leichhandschrift (A-Wn 2701). In two of the French sources the collection of chansons is followed by a group of two-voice motets after which the lais are to be found; and in the third collection a group of motets is nearby. All four sources are probably from the late 13th century but their repertories, partly anonymous, have such stylistic variety as to cause considerable disagreement on the early history of the lai form.

The Provençal vida of Garin d'Apchier states that he 'made the first descort that ever was made' ('fetz lo premier descort que anc fos faitz'), which would place the birth of the form around 1200; and while it is surely pertinent to ask how much the anonymous 14th-century biographer really understood about the subject, just as his comment raises again the question as to whether any clear distinction between the descort and the lyric lai was intended, it seems possible that the form appeared in the troubadour and trouvère traditions only shortly before 1200. This judgment may seem dangerous in view of the far greater antiquity of the sequence tradition, of the various discussions as to the roots of the sequence, and of the Celtic roots Handschin and others impute to the lai; nevertheless it makes sense in terms of the lyric tradition of the troubadours and trouvères as it survives, a tradition that grew up gently in the 12th century, gradually trying new formal ideas and expanding its boundaries as the century progressed.

Surveying the lais of the trouvère repertory (published almost complete in Jeanroy, Brandin and Aubry, 1901), Aubry called attention to a clear stylistic division falling approximately between those that were anonymous and those whose authors were known. The former (together with the two lais of Ernoul de Gastinois, who has even been suggested as a possible author for the others because they appear immediately after his lais in the Chansonnier de Noailles) include some extremely irregular patterns and occasional apparently incomplete musical notation on the basis of which a complete edition can require reconstruction and even guesswork. Aubry concluded that the incompletely notated lais were more improvisational and that they left hints as to possible Celtic origins for the genre; and several other scholars have pointed out that the tendency to repeat relatively brief musical phrases eight or nine times before moving on is perhaps symptomatic of some derivation from the style of the chanson de geste. Stäblein (1975) went further and proposed a chronology based on the assumptions that these less formalized pieces were earlier (an opinion it is difficult to endorse wholeheartedly in view of the full formalization of the substantially similar sequence form by 1100), and that the 'Lai des pucelles' (Coraigeus) was already written in the early 12th century when Abelard wrote his 'Planctus virginum Israel' to the same melody (for a contrary opinion see Weinrich, 1969): Stäblein suggested that all these anonymous lais may date from about 1100. He also proposed a chronology for the ascribed lais beginning with the three rather stolid pieces of Gautier de Dargies early in the 13th century, then the slightly freer works of the brothers Le Vinier; the second half of the 13th century was then represented by Colin Muset, Adam de Givenchi, Thomas Herier, Jacques de Cysoing and Ernoul le vielle de Gastinois.

Rietsch (DTÖ, xli, Jg.xx, 1913/R) observed many of the same characteristics in the Leichs of the Wiener Leichhandschrift as he found in some of the lais in the Jeanroy collection, especially those of Ernoul de Gastinois: he mentioned the short rhyming lines with no obvious scheme, rarity of clear stanza patterns and the use of greater responsion. Similarly, Stäblein (1975, pp.172–3) made an extremely interesting melodic analysis of a Leich by Tannhäuser, Ich lobe ein Wîp, and pointed out (p.97) that it is closely related in style to the French lais of the time. An adequate survey of the genres in the 13th century will need to view the French and German traditions together, if only because it is likely that none of the music in the French sources dates from later than about 1250 and the chronological (and stylistic) gap before the lais of the Roman de Fauvel is slightly closed by a consideration of the Leich of Herman Damen, a long rambling piece with constantly developing material, as well as those of Frauenlob with their consistently precise repetition in double versicles.

The developing melodic material just mentioned is perhaps the most absorbing characteristic of the lai as a musical form: figures and motifs carried from one section and expanded in the next are to some extent inevitable in a sectional monodic form the size of the lai, particularly if the composer has any feeling for the need to supply some shape to his work. In the opening section of Comencerai each unit builds on the preceding one, but the fifth unit grows anew out of the melodic material that had evolved at the end of the third and fourth units (ex.1; the texts, which have one syllable for each note or neume, are represented by only the rhyming syllable at the end of each line; for the text see §2 above).

Something similar happens in Herman Damen's Ir kristenen. The section of it in ex.2 contains short fragments repeated several times and representing a considerable change of pace after the more casual aab form that had characterized all that went before in the piece. This section is therefore transitional, setting up its own signposts, perceptibly changing character and, in the event, leading to a new section with a higher tessitura. The transitional passage treats a simple melodic figure in several different ways, finally transposing it up a tone before launching into the new section – at which point the frequency of repetition relaxes again and the melodic material for the first time in the piece has no obvious relation to that of the preceding sections. (For a similar attempt to describe part of a lai by Machaut, see Fallows, 1977.)

4. The lai after 1300. Schrade (1958) put forward tentative but persuasive arguments for suspecting that the four lais in the Roman de Fauvel could be the work of Philippe de Vitry, who otherwise contributed some of the most distinguished and modern music to that collection. The Regles de la seconde rhetorique (see Langlois, 1902, p.12) said: 'Aprez vint Philippe de Vitry qui trouva la maniere des motés, et des balades, et des lais et des simples rondeaux', and continued by praising Machaut 'le grant retthorique de nouvelle fourme, qui commencha toutes tailles nouvelles et les parfais lays d'amours'. In any case these four Fauvel lais are the only immediate precursors of the magnificent lais of Machaut. Their musical rhythm is clear, their sections are carefully balanced, and the repetitions have reached a regularity of form that suggests an effort to build on the basis of the 13th-century lai and crystallize it into a more balanced and logical shape in line with so many other innovations of the early 14th century. In these lais there is an even clearer sense of melodic progress: each section builds on the material with which the last ended, so the result is a constantly developing musical organism along the lines seen in the 13th-century lai but more continuous, more conscious of a thematic evolution.

Machaut's lais often include this feature, and in formal terms they follow the same scheme as those of the Roman de Fauvel. Nevertheless, the development of the mensural system opened new avenues: Machaut was able to vary the pace from one section to another thereby giving this still-growing form an opportunity to become even larger, with (effective) changes of tempo giving the whole piece a sense of variety and springiness that was not found earlier. In a way this is the major importance of Machaut's lais in musical history, for none of his other works is so long as to require such full and conscious exploitation of the mensural system, using musical techniques more commonly found in the larger mass cycles of the 15th century.

Four of Machaut's lais contain polyphony written in 'successive notation'. This is clearly indicated only in Je ne cesse de prier where the even-numbered stanzas have the annotation 'chace' and make three-voice polyphony if performed in unison canon with the entries three perfections apart. S'onques douleureusement can be performed in three-voice unison canon throughout. The polyphony of Pour ce que plus proprement is written after the manner of certain St Martial sources: the first versicle in each double-versicle stanza has different music from the second, but the two fit in excellent polyphony. Finally the music for stanzas 1, 2 and 3 in En demantant combines in three-voice polyphony as does that for stanzas 4–6, 7–9 and 10–12.

In all these cases there is a serious question as to how the music might best be performed: if each voice was sung and texted the cumulative effect of the poem would presumably be lost, so perhaps the canonic possibilities are merely aids towards the construction of an instrumental accompaniment more carefully controlled by the composer than it was in the monophonic repertories of the preceding generation. The polyphony of Machaut's lais has been observed but not explained.

If Machaut's lais must be regarded as the highpoint of the form's history, there is little evidence that any of his successors followed this lead. That 15th-century composers seem not to have given the form their attention may perhaps be because it was still an essentially monodic form, and monophonic writing had none of the prestige it enjoyed in earlier centuries. (Securely ascribed monophonic song in the 15th century survives only from Germany.) Another reason was possibly that the composer interested in developing extended forms concentrated more on the cyclic mass which was now beginning to take its definitive form.

But two examples of later lai composition have come to light and the circumstances surrounding each suggest that they were not entirely isolated but rather examples of a larger tradition that happens to have been lost. The lai De cuer je soupire (*c*1400; ed. in Wright, 1974) has exact double versicles and ouvert–clos cadences: the nature of its melodic line and its changes of pace both clearly separate it from the sequence tradition. And if the brevity of its sections contrasts strongly with the inflated length of the unset lais of Chartier and Granson this may be seen as the only way of keeping the form within the scope of other secular monophony in the 15th century. A similar situation exists in Hans Folz's 'Kettenton' (*c*1500), which Petzsch (1970) ingeniously identified as being in the lai form: again the sections are brief, and the continuous development of material passing from one section to the next is fully within the received tradition. If these are symptoms characteristic of a larger tradition, the size of the form in the 13th century was considerably expanded and reduced to formulae by composers in France and Germany after 1300, whereas the composers after Machaut reduced size and scope with the lai as they did with so much of their cultural heritage.

5. NOTES ON THE CHECKLIST OF LAI MUSIC. While it is clear that a study of the lai must take account of the poems and their form, it seems also that much can be learnt from a study of the music alone, and it is to this end that the appended list has been compiled. The fullest listing of texts is still that in Maillard (1963), where they are tabulated separately under lais (pp.71ff), descorts (pp.119ff) and Leichs (pp.153ff) and much additional material is included. In the list here four categories of material have been deliberately omitted: (i) the many poems in lai form with no surviving music: it is not suggested that these are unimportant, but that the reader of this dictionary might be grateful for a listing that confines itself to what music is actually there; (ii) other text sources for lais whose music does survive: they can quickly be ascertained from Maillard, from Tischler (1997 edn) and from the standard inventories of medieval literary genres; (iii) Latin pieces that might be described as in lai form: these are listed and discussed in Spanke (1936), and many are edited in Tischler (1997); (iv) strophic songs in which the individual stanza includes several musical repetitions, many of which are edited in Tischler (1997); (v) pieces that happen to be called lais either in manuscript titles or within the poem, but show no apparent trace of lai form (examples would be Gautier de Coincy's Entendez tuit ensemble and Harder's 'Kôr-wîse'), pieces that are in the form but are straight translations of sequences (such as Gautier's Hui enfantés) and pieces showing only elements of lai form (see Spanke, 1936, pp.91ff).

Unresolved questions as to the strict definition of the lai and as to its pre-history have made some of the decisions in this last category extremely difficult. One category has been included even though it strictly has nothing to do with the lai as defined here: the lyric insertions in the Roman de Tristan en prose are listed because many are entitled 'lai' and they represent a complete independent category of material; moreover they are included as such in the major studies of Wolf (1841) and Maillard (1963), and their omission could therefore cause unnecessary confusion.

Editions listed are not necessarily the best or the most recent but merely the most convenient for obtaining an overview of the repertory. Descriptions of form are added only when unambiguous and relatively simple.

Lai, François. See LAYS, FRANÇOIS.

Lainati, Carlo Ambrogio. See LONATI, CARLO AMBROGIO.

Laine, Dame Cleo [Campbell, Clementina Dinah] (b London, 28 Oct 1927). English jazz, popular and concert singer, and wife of JOHN DANKWORTH. Born of West Indian and English parents, she began singing at the age of three. In 1952 she joined the John Dankworth Seven; shortly after marrying Dankworth (1958) she left his group and began a very successful stage career, though she remained active as a singer. In 1969 she and Dankworth founded the Wavendon Allmusic Plan, an educational institution devoted to all styles of music. They performed together again in 1971, and in 1972 toured Australia as well as undertaking the first of a series of tours of the USA. Dankworth also worked as her arranger, composer and musical director.

Laine has recorded and performed opera, lieder and pop music as well as jazz, and in the 1980s was the only singer to have been nominated for Grammy awards in the female popular, classical and jazz categories. As a jazz singer she is both an interpreter and an improviser, and her scat singing, accompanied by Dankworth on alto saxophone or clarinet, is particularly noteworthy. Her contralto voice is capable of great variety of colour, and has an extraordinary upward extension in falsetto to c'''', giving her a compass of four octaves. She was made a DBE in 1997.

PAUL RINZLER (with HENRY PLEASANTS)

Laine, Frankie [Lo Vecchio, Frank Paul] (b Chicago, 30 March 1913). American pop singer. A former big band singer, Frankie Laine became one of the most popular recording stars of the 1950s. His big baritone voice proved to be particularly suited to ersatz but muscular country music and cowboy songs provided by his recording manager Mitch Miller and by Hollywood. Miller created the neo-Western mode in 1949 with Mule Train, a dramatic recording on which the accompaniment included the sound of a bull whip. Even more impassioned was Jezebel composed by Wayne Shanklin, in which the song's subject was accused of being 'the devil . . . born without a pair of horns'. Laine made subsequent cover versions of past country and western hits including Hank Williams's Your Cheating Heart and Bob Nolan's Cool Water.

In 1952 Miller and Laine recorded the film theme High Noon (do not forsake me) by Ned Washington and Dmitri Tiomkin. This led to further film and television themes including Gunfight at the OK Corral, Champion the Wonder Horse, Rawhide and Blazing Saddles, the title song of Mel Brooks's spoof Western film from 1974. On record Laine was usually accompanied by Paul Weston's orchestra; in cabaret his pianist was Carl Fisher, with whom he co-wrote the song We'll be together again.

DAVE LAING

Laird, Michael (b Harpenden, Herts., 22 Aug 1942). English trumpeter. Although he studied the modern trumpet at the RCM (1962–4), a crucial influence on him was the baroque trumpeter, Walter Holy, whom he met in Cologne in 1963. Urged by David Munrow, Laird also took up the cornett in Munrow's Early Music Consort. Further milestones include playing with the Steinitz Bach Players, in the Academy of St Martin-in-the-Fields and in the Philip Jones Brass Ensemble (negating Jones's one-time assessment of him as a schoolboy with 'limited professional potential'). Although an influential player and teacher of the natural trumpet, Laird has also continued to play the modern trumpet. He is co-founder, with Robert Howes, of the period-instrument group Baroque Brass of London. His many recordings include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto no.2 (under Pinnock), Biber's trumpet sonatas and concertos by Vivaldi and Telemann.

GEORGE PRATT

Laïs, François. See LAYS, FRANÇOIS.

Lais, Johan Dominico (fl 2nd half of the 16th century). Arranger and ?composer. He was the joint-compiler with Sixt Kargel of Nova eaque artificiosa et valde commoda ratio ludendae cytharae (RISM 1575[18]), a tablature volume of 63 dances for six-course solo cittern tuned b–G–d–g–d′–e′. Some of the pieces use vocal models from French, Italian and German sources, including works by Lassus, Arcadelt, Berchem, Crecquillon, Didier Lupi Second, Rore and Senfl. The tablature system is Italian and the volume also contains rules in Latin and German for tuning. The 1575 edition was followed by another from the same printer (RISM 1578[26]; 1 ed. in Wolf); a collection referred to by Draud as Carmina italica, gallica et germanica ludenda cythara (Strasbourg, 1569) may have been an earlier edition of the same work.

Laisse. A form of stanza used primarily in French epic poetry of the Middle Ages (see CHANSON DE GESTE and CHANTE-FABLE). A laisse consists of a varying number of lines each having the same number of syllables and linked together by assonance. In many poems the laisse ends with a line of different length, sometimes in the form of a refrain or an apparently meaningless series of vowels or short syllables. In a few instances such last lines are provided with notes, with no clear indication of metre or of relation to other lines in the laisse.

HENDRIK VAN DER WERF

Laisser vibrer (Fr.: 'let vibrate'). A performing direction instructing that the sound should not be damped. It is found in music for the harp, certain percussion instruments (notably cymbals), the piano (indicating that the sustaining pedal should remain depressed) and occasionally string instruments.

Laitinen, Heikki (b Ylivieska, 8 Nov 1943). Finnish composer, performer, teacher and musicologist. A student of Erik Bergman, his early compositions showed modernist inclination until a shift came in the 1970s when he began to study, teach and perform folk music. Between 1974 and 1983 he was director of the influential Folk Music Institute at Kaustinen. In 1981 he was involved in setting up an alternative music teaching project, becoming in 1983 the first head of the folk music department of the Sibelius Academy. Laitinen frequently participates in performances of his own works, from archaic rune singing of the Kalevela, the Finnish national epic, to experimental combinations involving vocal expression and sound processing equipment. He has combined improvised music with the improvised dance of Reijo Kela, and has worked with the musician Kimmo Pohjonen. In 1990 he began an association with the Suomussalmi group, 15 musicians and dancers working on the same improvising principle who have produced Nyt riitti (Now, the Rite/That's Enough, 1995–9). In 1996 Laitinen founded his own record label, HecRec, and in 1999 Ääniteatteri ('the Voice Theatre'). Appointed Artist Professor (1995–2000), he is considered one of the most versatile and innovative figures in Finnish music. His leadership of the seminal folk music course at the Sibelius Academy with its stress on orality, improvisation, composition, ensemble and solo performance, and arrangement, rooted in a thorough knowledge of traditional folk music and instrumentation, with the objective to break through perceived limits in the creation of a 'folk music of the future', has produced a distinguished generation of innovative musicians including MARIA KALANIEMI, Anna-Kaisa Liedes, members of the ensembles VÄRTTINÄ and JÄRVELÄN PIKKUPELIMANNIT.

JAN FAIRLEY

Lajarte, Théodore (Edouard Dufaure de) (b Bordeaux, 10 July 1826; d Paris, 20 June 1890). French musicologist and composer. A pupil of Leborne at the Paris Conservatoire, he concentrated on composition during the first part of his life. His works include at least ten opéras comiques (among which Le secret de l'oncle Vincent of 1855 had notable success), two ballets, choral works and music for military band. He wrote in a simple and correct manner, but showed little originality; he sometimes imitated 18th-century music or the 19th-century Viennese style. He is better known for his new editions of early music: Airs à danser de Lully à Méhul (Paris, 1876), Chefs-d'oeuvre classiques de l'opéra français (Paris, 1880), and vocal scores of 11 operas by Lully, two by Rameau and one by Campra (in the Michaelis collection, 1880–82). From 1873 he worked as a librarian in the archives of the Opéra, under the direction of Charles Nuitter, and there undertook his principal achievement, the Bibliothèque musicale du théatre de l'Opéra. This valuable work, with an excellent preface, gives a list of works performed at the Opéra from its origins in 1669 until 1876, providing historical and bibliographical information for each work. Lajarte wrote several other books and contributed to many periodicals. He also organized concerts of early music, particularly in south-west France.

Lajovic, Anton (b Vače, Slovenia, 19 Dec 1878; d Ljubljana, 28 Aug 1960). Slovene composer. After studies at the Ljubljana Glasbena Matica music school, he was a composition pupil of Fuchs at the Vienna Conservatory (1897–1902), concurrently completing his training in law at the university. While practising law in Slovenia and Croatia he composed and published articles on music. Influenced by late Romanticism and, particularly after World War I, Impressionism, he became a champion of new developments in Slovenian music. His greatest contribution was in his songs and choruses. He was a member of the Slovenian Academy of Sciences and Arts.

ANDREJ RIJAVEC/IVAN KLEMENČIČ

Lajtha, László (b Budapest, 30 June 1892; d Budapest, 16 Feb 1963). Hungarian composer, ethnomusicologist and teacher.

1. LIFE. He studied composition at the National Hungarian Royal Academy of Music (1909–13) under Victor Herzfeld and the piano with Arnold Székely and Árpád Szendy. Concurrently he read law at the university, where he obtained a degree in 1918. In 1910 he became associated with the folk music movement of Bartók and Kodály and joined their collecting expeditions, which he continued independently. On his early travels he visited Leipzig (1910), Geneva (1910–11) and Paris (1911–13), where his becoming acquainted with some of the leading musicians contributed to the widening of his experience and outlook. In 1913 he joined the staff of the ethnographical department of the Hungarian National Museum. After the war, in 1919, he was appointed professor of composition and chamber music at the National Conservatory in Budapest, of which he became honorary director after World War II.

In 1926 Lajtha became choirmaster of the Goudimel Choir of the Calvinist church in Budapest. At another Calvinist church in Budapest, on Szabadság tér, he would later organize a chamber orchestra and conduct its performances from 1940 to 1947. In 1929 he won the Coolidge Prize for his Third String Quartet, and in the following year joined the publishing house Leduc, becoming the only Hungarian composer represented by French publishers. From 1932 he worked for the Institute of Intellectual Cooperation, a League of Nations organization, and played an important role in the music section of the Commission Internationale des Arts Populaires (CIAP) until 1939. After the end of hostilities he served as director of the music department in the Hungarian Broadcasting Service (1945–6).

In the years between the wars Lajtha travelled widely in Europe, appearing frequently in Paris, the place of his most important successes (particularly at the Triton concerts). In 1947, when the CIAP held its first postwar meeting in Paris, he took part in the deliberations which resulted in the setting up of the International Folk Music Council. In the same year he visited London, where he finished his important Third Symphony and Variations for orchestra. In 1951 he was awarded the Kossuth Prize in recognition of his work on Hungarian folk music and became the teacher of folk music transcription at the Budapest Academy of Music. In 1955 he was elected a corresponding member of the Institut de France. During the 1950s he worked and lived in Budapest in isolation he did not travel abroad again until 1962. He continued to collect folk music from parts of western Hungary until his death in 1963.

2. WORKS. In many respects Lajtha occupied a unique position among Hungarian composers. Like Bartók and Kodály he was not only acknowledged as a composer of distinction, but also recognized as an authority on folk music; further, again like Bartók and Kodály, his activities were not confined to creative and scientific work, but also included teaching. His main distinguishing characteristic, however, was his attachment to French, and generally to Latin, culture in sensibility and taste. In this he was one of the few nonconformists of Hungarian music history, most of whose development was affected by German influences. Superior workmanship is the most prominent and consistent feature of his music; and the principle that 'in all works of art the quality of craftsmanship is a decisive factor of evaluation' always guided his artistic consideration.

Regarding the Hungarian accent, the influence of Magyar folk music is less obvious in his works than in those of Bartók and Kodály, chiefly because Lajtha was attracted by another aspect of the traditional materials: it was their melodic shape and form, viewed primarily as an objective musical element regardless of their peculiarly national characteristics, that inspired him. This conception admitted a considerable stylistic freedom of treatment: thus the Magyar flavour succeeded in permeating equally his Italianized passages (e.g. the slow movement of the Sonatina for violin and piano and the 'Aria' from the Cello Sonata), his sectional forms (couplets, rondeaux etc.) modelled on classical French prototypes, dance movements and contrapuntal textures (fugues). It also permitted him to resort to popular tunes, some of which are not strictly folktunes, often assuming the understanding of an allusive quotation, and to subject them to 'Western' treatment, i.e. elaborate harmonization and contrapuntal development (especially in the Serenade for string trio and the Sinfonietta for string orchestra). Here there is an unexpected affinity with 19th-century Romantic Hungarian composers, who also availed themselves of popular tunes and treated them in Western (mainly German) fashion, and whose style and endeavours were vehemently rejected by the generation immediately following, to which Lajtha himself belonged.

These stylistic mainstays kept in view, a survey of Lajtha's music reveals an almost unbroken continuity of development, in the early phases of which the harmonic aspects are stressed, giving place, during subsequent stages, to predominantly contrapuntal treatment and arriving at an equilibrium of craftsmanship and invention of exceptional clarity and directness. Seen from another standpoint, Lajtha's development may be characterized as a gradual assertion of melody.

The harmonic style of Lajtha's early works shows a complex idiom derived from the experimental tendencies of the first decade of the 20th century: superimposed 4ths, appoggiaturas and suspensions and other dissonant aggregates furnish the basis of chordal structure whose progression is predominantly chromatic. These are evident in his early piano works, where the specific influences of Bartók and Debussy are also discernible; in addition the part-writing of his Piano Sonata, apart from its considerable harmonic complexities, is conceived in the grand virtuoso manner of Liszt. In his subsequent works, where the contrapuntal aspect gradually gained prominence, his harmony, though not relinquishing the advanced vocabulary, is subordinated to the horizontal elements. Discords are more purposefully used, and their tension values consequently become increased. Emergence of counterpoint also led to a preoccupation with chamber combinations during a period which may be said to have started, approximately, with the years following World War I and lasted up to about the mid-1930s. The most typical works, with the points previously mentioned well in evidence, are the Third and Fourth Quartets, the Second String Trio and the Fifth Quartet, which indicates a transition to his subsequent creative period. This was characterized, as far as harmony is concerned, by a return to a chordal structure of diatonic purity, in which Lajtha rediscovered the far from exhausted potentialities of the common chord. The new harmonic conception is evident in the extended D major passages of the Capriccio and the sustained E♭ of his Third Symphony. Nevertheless, Lajtha's was fundamentally a contrapuntal temperament. Even in his early works contrapuntal passages appear frequently, and their neatness and competence of treatment, although embryonic, provide a curious contrast to his harmonic extravagance.

In Lajtha's second period horizontal elements dominate, manifesting themselves above all in the frequency of complete fugues expanding into independent movements, prolonged fugal and imitative passages, and of canonic treatment. The contrapuntal aspect is also evident in his particular treatment of figuration; though obviously instrumental in character, his invention shows a conspicuous melodic shapeliness. The primacy of horizontal values in these works also appears in the contrapuntally conditioned harmony derived from the interplay of the various polyphonic strains. In the earlier works of this period the resulting harmony is often bitonal or polytonal (e.g. the chamber music with piano, in which this treatment is particularly advantageous owing to the differentiation of colour). In later works his return to a simplified harmonic basis resulted in a more euphonious texture, as in the chamber music with harp, the Capriccio and the Third String Trio. The vitality of his counterpoint gains a great deal from the energy of his rhythmic drive: derived from folk music impulses, Lajtha's symphonic music absorbed this element into a 'civilized' musical speech much more readily than did Bartók's or Kodály's.

In Lajtha's next period the assertion of melodic values was his main concern. Seeking to display them in a suitable formal disposition prompted him to investigate the designs of Italian and French 17th- and 18th-century composers; the titles of many of his movements – 'Aria', 'Strophes et ritournelles' etc. – indicate this attitude. The conspicuous simplification of musical grammar, concurrently with and in consequence of a superior technical accomplishment, produces in these works an equilibrium between transparency of expression and range of emotional sensibility, between technique and inspiration: a classical art in the truest sense of the word (see the symphonies, especially the Third, the Sinfonietta for strings and the Third String Trio).

Lajtha's folk music investigation included the collecting of melodies from those districts which were left largely untouched by Bartók and Kodály. These explorations yielded many variants of the previously collected material which, together with not a few hitherto unknown tunes, supplemented the work of the two pioneers. Lajtha took a considerable share in the work conducted in the Ethnographical Museum of transcribing melodies from recordings: he was engaged in this almost continuously from the time he joined the society. As a delegate of the Hungarian Ethnographical Society he took an active part in the gramophone recording scheme undertaken jointly by the society and the Hungarian Broadcasting Station in 1937. Among his numerous collecting expeditions those in the 1930s (Great Hungarian Plain and adjoining districts) and during the years 1940 to 1944 (Transylvania) were the most important. Material from the latter was prepared for publication in 1950 in the series Népzenei monográfiák, in which appeared his most important ethnomusicological publications (1954–62). In the last years of his life he gave several ethnomusicological lectures in Paris, London and Oslo.

Lajtha's interest in folk music led him to investigate other, related manifestations of folk art: he was a leading authority on folkdance. He also served the cause of folk music by taking part in many conferences and joining the international organizations such as the CIAP and International Folk Music Council.

As a teacher Lajtha exercised an influence necessarily less than that of the professors at the academy; yet in encouraging his pupils to study the Latin musical culture he did a great service to the indigenous development of a healthy musical life. As a professor at the Budapest Academy of Music, he was the first to introduce folk music transcription into the ordinary curriculum. In his composition class at the conservatory he insisted on the investigation of modern, especially French music. In general he did not attach great importance to an academic, prescribed course of study, but relied on the intellectual curiosity of his students, which he stimulated with his sharp-witted conversation and by allowing free discussion of controversial points.

He studied music in Cluj and Budapest, taking the doctorate at Cluj in 1946 with a dissertation on the Romanian folksong and its literature. He taught the violin at the conservatory in Cluj (1919–23), and founded the Lakatos Quartet (1920–40); he also taught music history at the Gheorghe Dima Conservatory, Cluj (1949–63). Concurrently he became known as a musicologist and music critic; in particular he wrote on the music history of Transylvania and its documentary sources, and on Romanian-Magyar relations. He delivered numerous papers on the interrelation of Romanian musical culture and that of neighbouring peoples. His publications are largely of documentary material, particularly of letters by Prokofiev, Bartók, Berg, Richard Strauss and others.

VIOREL COSMA

Lake, Mayhew Lester [Brockton, Lester] (b Southville, MA, 25 Oct 1879; d Palisade, NJ, 16 March 1955). American composer, conductor, editor and arranger. He studied at the New England Conservatory and was playing the violin with professional symphony orchestras in Boston by the age of 16. From 1896 to 1910 he conducted various theatre orchestras, including the orchestra of the Teatro Payret, Havana, then one of the largest theatres in the western hemisphere. He later moved to New York, where he wrote arrangements for Victor Herbert, John Philip Sousa, Edwin Franko Goldman, Percy Grainger, Henry Hadley and George M. Cohan. In 1913 he became editor-in-chief of band and orchestral music at Carl Fischer, a position he held for 35 years. His textbook, The American Band Arranger, was published by Fischer in 1920. He taught at the Ernest Williams School, Columbia University and New York University. He also conducted his band, Symphony in Gold, for NBC radio. More than 3000 of his arrangements and compositions were published, some under the pseudonym Lester Brockton. The Heritage of the March series of recordings includes a sample of his work. Lake's autobiography is entitled Great Guys: Laughs and Gripes of Fifty Years of Show-Music Business (Grosse Pointe Woods, MI, 1983).

Lakes, Gary (b Dallas, TX, 26 Sept 1950). American tenor. He studied at Seattle, where he made his début in 1981 as Froh. After winning the Melchior Auditions at the Juilliard School, New York, he sang Florestan in Mexico City (1983), Achilles (Iphigénie en Aulide) at Waterloo, New Jersey (1984), and Saint-Saëns's Samson in Charlotte, North Carolina (1985). He made his Metropolitan début in 1986 as the High Priest (Idomeneo) and has subsequently sung many roles there, notably Walther von der Vogelweide, Bacchus (which he recorded with Levine), Siegmund, Florestan, Parsifal and Aeneas (Les Troyens). He had also appeared in San Francisco, Buenos Aires and many of the leading European opera houses, and made an acclaimed début at the Châtelet, Paris, as Samson in 1991. Lakes's other recordings include Heurtal in Magnard's Guercoeur, Aeneas and the title role in Weber's Oberon. He has an imposing stage presence and a powerful, brilliant-toned voice, heard to particular advantage in the French heroic tenor repertory.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Lakita [laquita]. PANPIPES of the Bolivian altiplano. They are usually played in pairs at certain religious and community feasts.

Lakner, Yehoshua (b Bratislava, 24 April 1924). Israeli-Swiss composer of Slovak origin. After emigrating to Palestine in 1941, Lakner, who was Jewish, settled in Tel-Aviv, where he studied the piano with Frank Pelleg and composition with Alexander Uriyah Boskovich and Oedoen Partos. In 1952, under the auspices of the International Arts Program of the Institute of International Education, he travelled to the USA, where he studied with Copland at Tanglewood. He pursued further study with Karlheinz Stockhausen, Gottfried Michael Koening and Mauricio Kagel at the WDR Studio for Electronic Music, Cologne, and with Bernd Alois Zimmermann at the Cologne Musikhochschule. From 1948 to 1963 he taught at the Rubin Academy of Music, Tel-Aviv. He moved to Switzerland in 1963 to teach and compose. Concentrating on incidental music, he wrote scores for all of Maria von Ostfelden's productions (1965–71) and for the première of Brecht's Turandot at the Zürich Schauspielhaus (1969). Later, he taught music theory at the Zürich Conservatory (1974–87). His many awards include the Engel Prize (Tel-Aviv, 1958), the Salomon David Steinberg Foundation music prize (Zürich and Jerusalem, 1970) and the city of Zürich's year-long composition award (1986–7).

Lakner's early instrumental music shows a keen sense of rhythm, indicative of his interest in jazz and the traditional music of Asia Minor, and employs pitch organizations best described as somewhere between modal and serial. In the 1960s and 70s he turned to musique concrète and electronic music, composing a number of electro-acoustic incidental works. In 1985 he began to use the computer as his main instrument, creating what he has termed Audio-Visual Time Structures (AVTS). These musical and visual configurations ('Zeit-Gestalten') are methodically developed in poetic forms that can be manipulated in real time during performance.

ALFRED ZIMMERLIN

Laks, Szymon [Simon] (b Warsaw, 1 Nov 1901; d Paris, 11 Dec 1983). Polish composer. He studied mathematics for two years at Vilnius University before entering the Warsaw Academy of Music, where he studied under Statkowski, Melcer and Rytel (1921–4). In 1926 he went to Paris to study with Vidal and Rabaud at the Conservatoire. Arrested by the Germans in 1941, he spent three years in the concentration camps of Auschwitz and Dachau. A large quantity of his manuscripts was lost during the war. In 1945 he returned to Paris, promoting music in Polish émigré circles. The best of his work is in the deeply lyrical vocal music, concentrated in expression and simple in language. Many of his pieces are based on Polish folk music.

TERESA CHYLIŃSKA

Lal, Chatur (b Udaipur, Rajasthan, 23 Jan 1925; d Delhi, 14 Nov 1965). Indian tablā player. His father was a well-known musician and he began his musical training when he was seven, studying first under Pandit Nathu Lalji and later with Ustad Hafiz Mian of Udaipur. In 1947 he joined All-India Radio, remaining on its staff as an accompanist and soloist until his early death. Even as a young man he accompanied some of the leading musicians of the time, particularly Ravi Shankar. In 1954 he toured the USA and Europe with Ustad Ali Akbar Khan, and he accompanied Ravi Shankar during his tour of the USA and Europe (1956) and two subsequent extensive tours; he also performed in the former USSR, Australia and Romania. Besides accompanying noted musicians in their recordings, he made several records as a soloist.

NARAYANA MENON

Lalande, Desiré Alfred (b Paris, 5 Sept 1866; d London, 8 Nov 1904). French oboist. After two and a half years at the Paris Conservatoire under Georges Gillet, Lalande's first professional engagement was with Lamoureux. He came to England in 1886 to join the Hallé (in which his father was a bassoonist) where he remained for five years. After a period with the Scottish Orchestra he joined the Queen's Hall Orchestra. In 1897 Henry Wood appointed him first oboist for the third season of the Promenade Concerts in succession to Malsch.

The delicacy and refinement of Lalande's performance did much to foster appreciation of the French school of oboe playing in England at a period when in many areas German artists were predominant. Many regarded him as the finest oboist of his time in Britain. The beauty of his tone was remarkable, particularly in solos for english horn.

PHILIP BATE

Lalande [La Lande, Delalande], Michel-Richard de (b Paris, 15 Dec 1657; d Versailles, 18 June 1726). French composer, harpsichordist and organist. He was the leading composer of the high Baroque grand motet at the French court.

1. Life. 2. Sacred works. 3. Secular vocal and stage works. 4. Symphonies and caprices.

1. LIFE. Lalande was the 15th child of Michel Lalande, a Parisian master tailor, and Claude Dumoutiers. Most information about his early life comes from notarial and archival documents, church registers, the Mercure galant and the anecdotal 'Discours sur la vie et les ouvrages de M. De la Lande' by the poet Alexandre Tannevot, which served as a preface to the posthumous engraved edition (1729–34) of 40 grands motets, the Miserere à voix seule and three Leçons de ténèbres.

On 15 April 1667 Lalande (together with Marin Marais) entered the choir of the royal church of St Germain-l'Auxerrois, Paris, where he remained until 18 November 1672. The director of the choir, François Chaperon, gave preference for solos to the young Lalande on account of his 'beautiful voice' and 'ardour for study'. To introduce Lalande to the public, weekly concerts of his earliest compositions were given at the home of his brother-in-law. In 1680, after Chaperon's transfer to the Ste-Chapelle, Paris, he invited Lalande (then aged 22) to contribute some of his Leçons de Ténèbres to the repertory in Holy Week. Nothing is known of Lalande's formal musical training. The 'Discours' tells us that he preferred the violin among the instruments he cultivated in his youth, but when he was rejected by Lully for the opera orchestra he 'renounced the violin forever'. He mastered both harpsichord and organ, perhaps studying the latter with Charles Damour, the organist at St Germain-l'Auxerrois. (Tannevot stated that 'the harpsichord, which he studied so seriously in his youth, was his greatest relaxation right up to his death'.) The Maréchal de Noailles, who had employed him as a harpsichord teacher for his daughter, recommended that Louis XIV should do likewise for his two daughters by Mme de Montespan, Louise-Françoise (Mlle de Nantes) and Françoise-Marie (Mlle de Blois). According to the 'Discours', Lalande played the organ for the king at Saint Germain-en-Laye in 1678, but Louis XIV thought him too young to be appointed organiste du roy.

His skill as an organist was sufficient to gain him employment in four Paris churches: the Jesuit church of St Louis, the conventual church of Petit St Antoine, St Gervais and St Jean-en-Grève. For the Collège de Clermont (known later as the Collège Louis-le-Grand) he also composed intermèdes and choruses (now lost) for the dramatic productions of the Jesuits. On the death in 1679 of Charles Couperin, Lalande was contracted to remain at St Gervais until Couperin's eldest son, François, was 18 (in 1686). However, after Lalande's appointment as sous-maître for the October quarter at the royal chapel in 1683, the young Couperin (as well as Lalande's elder brother François) must have deputized for Lalande on a regular basis at St Gervais; in 1690 Lalande, in his approbation, found François Couperin's two organ masses 'fort belles, et dignes d'estre données au Public'. In 1682 Lalande replaced Pierre Meliton at St Jean-en-Grève. He remained there as organist until the increasing responsibilities of his court positions forced his resignation in 1691. (No firm evidence has been adduced to support the assertion (see Corp, 1995) of a particular musical connection between Lalande and the exiled Jacobean court at Saint Germain-en-Laye at this time.)

In 1683, when the sous-maîtres Du Mont and Robert retired from the royal chapel, the king ordered a competition to replace them; 35 musicians took part (among them Charpentier, Desmarets, Lorenzani and Nivers). This number was narrowed to 15, who were all obliged to set the text of Psalm xxxii, Beati quorum; on the basis of these compositions (only Lalande's survives), four were chosen to share the responsibilities by quarters: Coupillet (January), Collasse (April), Minoret (July) and Lalande (October). According to the 'Discours', Louis XIV himself intervened to assure the quarter for Lalande, initiating his rise as a favoured court composer. A little over a year later, in January 1685, he was appointed compositeur de la musique de la chambre, sharing half the year with Collasse, the other half being controlled by Pierre Robert. In January 1689, aged 31, he became a surintendant de la musique de la chambre, the most coveted musical post at court, and the same year the king ordered the court copyists, François Fossard and André Danican Philidor l'aîné, to make a complete manuscript collection of Lalande's grands motets, a singular honour (F-V Mus 8–17). In September 1693, after the enforced retirement of Coupillet (for whom Henry Desmarets had 'ghost-written' several grands motets), Lalande added the quarter of January as sous-maître to that of October. In March 1704, on the retirement of Collasse, the king gave the April quarter to 'nostre bien aimé Richard Michel de La Lande'. In 1714 the Marquis de Dangeau noted in his journal for 29 September: 'There are several changes in the king's music for the chapel. The maître de musique for the July quarter . . . the Abbé Minoret, has retired'. Minoret's departure seems to have been provoked not by infirmity, as the official record suggests, but, according to Marc-François Bêche, by disgust that Louis XIV chose Lalande's Cantate Domino canticum novum to impress the visiting Elector of Bavaria rather than a work by Minoret, whose 'quarter' it was (see Sawkins 1986). Dangeau continues: 'The king gave him 3500 livres as a pension and joined his quarter to the three others already held by La Lande . . . When [Lalande] is ill and there is no one assigned to his post, [Jean-Baptiste] Matho will conduct (battra la mesure) for him'. Thus, from 1 July 1715, the music of the royal chapel was under the control of one man for the first time, just two months before Louis XIV died. Although described by Tannevot as 'shy in public', Lalande does not seem to have been deterred in his accumulation of most of the official positions available to a court musician. As well as those already mentioned, in 1700, after Robert's death, Lalande was given three-quarter control as compositeur de la musique de la chambre, and following Collasse's death in 1709 all charges for this office were his. From 1689, when he was appointed surintendant de la musique de la chambre (replacing Jean-Louis Lully), he shared the year with Jean-Baptiste Boesset. In 1695 Boesset sold his charge of maître de musique de la chambre to Lalande for 16,000 livres. Lalande, who could raise only part of the money, turned to André Danican Philidor, who lent him 14,400 livres over a two-year period.

1. Michel-Richard de Lalande: engraving by Henri-Simon Thomassin after Jean-Baptiste Santerre

In July 1684 Lalande married the singer Anne Rebel, daughter of Jean Rebel, ordinaire de la musique du roy, and half-sister of Jean-Fery Rebel, the violinist, conductor and director of the Paris Opéra. According to the 'Discours', Louis XIV himself covered all the wedding expenses. The couple had two daughters, Marie-Anne (b 1686) and Jeanne (b 1687), both of whom became well-known singers; they were rewarded for their industry by Louis XIV, who in 1706 gave each a pension of 1000 livres, while expressing a wish that they should sing during his Mass. Tannevot stated that 'it is to them that we owe those beautiful soprano solos which M. De la Lande composed in response to the beauty of their voices'. Unfortunately both succumbed to smallpox in May 1711. The death of the dauphin in the same year forged an even closer bond between the French king and the son of a Paris tailor; Louis XIV is quoted as saying to Lalande, a few days after the death of the composer's daughters, 'You have lost two daughters who were deserving of merit. I have lost Monseigneur . . . La Lande we must submit ('se soumettre')'. A few months later (18 April 1712), at the king's request, Lalande conducted 129 musicians of the royal chapel in a memorial service for the dauphin and his wife at St Denis (among the works probably performed was Lalande's Dies irae, originally written for the dauphine's funeral in 1690, but revised in 1711).

Lalande lived comfortably as a result of royal appointments and lucrative pensions, which included one of 6000 livres paid to him and his wife from 1713 out of the revenues of the Paris Opéra. He was one of the few composers of his day to own a coach. When in Paris, he lived in a large three-storey house on the rue Ste-Anne which had formerly belonged to his father-in-law. An inventory of 11 May 1722 following the death of Anne Rebel reveals an abundance of material possessions, including much silver, more than 50 paintings, a fine harpsichord (valued at 300 livres), two viols and two violins. In addition to his town house, he had a ground-floor apartment in the Grand Commun at Versailles close to the château and a country house and garden in the Parc-aux-Cerfs.

After the king's death in 1715, when the Regency court moved to Paris, Lalande gradually abandoned his heavy responsibilities. In doing so he made sure that his best pupils, André Cardinal Destouches, François Collin de Blamont and Jean-François de La Porte, received good positions. In February 1718 Destouches took over one of the charges of surintendant; he was succeeded in the same post by Collin de Blamont in November 1719. In March 1718 Lalande's brother-in-law, Jean-Fery Rebel, and La Porte succeeded him as compositeur de la musique de la chambre.

On 5 May 1722 Lalande's wife died. Soon afterwards Louis XV made the composer a Chevalier of the Order of St Michel, possibly at the time of the coronation at Reims (25 October) for which Lalande directed the music. Later the same year, according to Tannevot, when the court returned to Versailles, Lalande expressed his desire to remit voluntarily three-quarters of his salary at the royal chapel in order to return to the original situation of four sous-maîtres. Touched by his request, Louis XV agreed and in January 1723 granted him an annual life pension of 3000 livres. A new generation of composers, protégés of the regent, Philippe of Orléans, were quickly chosen for the three vacancies (André Campra, Nicolas Bernier and Charles-Hubert Gervais).

Lalande remarried in 1723; his bride was Marie-Louise de Cury (1692–1775), a daughter of the Princess of Conti's surgeon. They had one daughter, Marie-Michelle (1724–81). According to the 'Discours', Lalande died of pneumonia in 1726; he was buried in the church of Notre Dame de Versailles, not far from the château where he had served for 43 years.

2. SACRED WORKS. The 'Versailles style' – initiated by Veillot and Formé, developed most significantly by Du Mont and the model for Lully and Robert – reached full flower in the 77 authenticated grands motets composed and reworked by Lalande over 46 years. During the entire 18th century they were considered to be 'masterpieces of the genre' (Rousseau). As late as 1780 La Borde, in his Essai sur la musique ancienne et moderne, viewed Lalande as the 'creator of a new genre of church music'. Their eloquent message touched both the favoured few who attended the king's Mass in the royal chapel and, after 1725, the crowds who applauded them at the newly established Concert Spirituel in Paris. During the first 45 years of the Concert Spirituel there were more than 590 performances of 41 different Lalande grands motets and throughout the 18th century they were heard at the royal chapel. The final issue of the Livre de motets pour la chapelle du roy, printed by Ballard in 1792, gives the titles of 14 motets by Lalande in the repertory between January and June of that year. The durability of Lalande's motets is also attested by the many manuscript copies in provincial libraries throughout France. For example, the academies that promoted concerts in Lyons acquired copies of early versions of motets such as Cantate Domino in Lalande's lifetime (now in F-LYm). The Bibliothèque Méjanes in Aix-en-Provence also has unique copies (scores and parts) of early versions of other motets as well as several parts bearing the date 1819. The popularity of these works in the 18th century is further documented by the number of récits in manuscript collections which were extracted from the grands motets to provide a solo repertory for church or convent as well as for noble amateurs. One such collection of Tous les récits du basse taille des motets de Mr De La Lande (F-AIXmc F.c.385) was made in 1731–2 for the duc de Noailles by Christien Le Noble, a successor as copyist to André Danican Philidor. Some récits 'ajustés pour être chantés à l'orgue' found their way into convent repertories (e.g. F-Pn Rés.1899). One such collection, made as late as 1765 in the Provençale town of Apt, is the unique source of several of Lalande's grands motets (F-Pn Vm¹ 3123). There is also an example of an entire motet, O filii et filiae, in a reduction for soprano solo and continuo, for performance at the Concert Spirituel (F-Pn Rés.2560).

Far from representing what Bukofzer called 'the most conservative spirit of the period' (Music in the Baroque Era, New York, 1947), Lalande's motets bring together totally dissimilar elements with an unprecedented depth of feeling. Galant 'operatic' airs and the majestic 'official' style of the Versailles motet stand side by side. Cantus firmus treatment of Gregorian melodies in finely wrought polyphony (such as in Sacris solemniis) is found together with weighty homophonic 'battle' choruses akin to those in Lully's Bellérophon (as in Deus noster refugium). Lalande was deeply imbued with the spirit of the Latin psalms he chose. The warmth of his musical language humanized the grand motet. A perceptive and deeply felt homage to Lalande was included in the avertissement of the posthumous engraved edition; it was written by a protégé of the composer, Collin de Blamont, who described his former teacher as a 'Latin Lully' and continued:

> His great merit . . . consisted in wonderful choice of melody, judicious use of harmony and nobility of expression. He understood the value of the words he chose to treat and rendered (in music) the true meaning of the majestic and holy enthusiasm of the Prophets . . . Profound and learned on the one hand, simple and natural on the other, he applied all his study to touch the soul by richness of expression and vivid pictorialism. The mind is refreshed by the pleasing variety not only from one piece to the next, but within the same piece, . . . by the ingenious disparities with which he ornaments his works, by the graceful melodies which serve as contrasting episodes to the most complex choral sections.

Clearly, Collin de Blamont is describing here the late motets or the final versions of earlier motets that make up the posthumous edition.

2. Title-page of Lalande's 'Motets', i (Paris: Boivin, 1729)

Four large collections contain most of Lalande's grands motets: the manuscript copy of 27 motets, made in 1689–90 by Philidor, Fossard and an unnamed third scribe (F-V Mus 8–17); copies of 11 motets (both full scores and parts) which Philidor made for the Count of Toulouse, beginning in 1704 or 1705 (Pn Rés.F.1694–7); the 1729 engraved edition of 40 motets; and a manuscript copy of 41 motets made for a certain Gaspard Alexis Cauvin (F-V Mus 216–35, Pn Rés Vmb MS 16; other volumes from Cauvin's collection are in the Collection François Lang, Royaumont). The Cauvin manuscript is a mid-18th-century copy clearly based on earlier copies, with a changed sequence of motets and with the addition of the instrumental inner parts (missing from the engraved edition). For some motets which exist in other full scores from Lalande's lifetime (such as some in the Toulouse-Philidor collection and others now in Lyons), it can be shown that the Cauvin scores, including their inner parts, correspond to versions earlier than those in the engraved edition. For Exaudi Deus the Cauvin copy is virtually identical to that in the Philidor collection of 1689–90, except that it omits the lowest of the three viola parts (the quinte de violon).

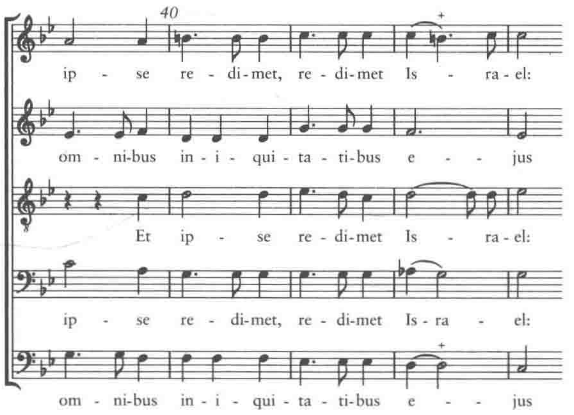
Lalande constantly revised his grands motets; 29 exist in more than one version (some in more than two), while others are provided with alternative versions of single movements. There are others, too, which survive only in mature versions but are known to have originated at much earlier dates. According to the 'Discours', > from the time of the former king [Louis XIV], he had begun to make changes in several of his earlier motets. Noting this, His Majesty prevented him from continuing, possibly to render more obvious the progress made under his aegis by the composer, possibly to preserve the graces and naïvety of the first works, or finally, because of fear that this occupation which took so much time would prevent him from composing new music.

In his Apologie de la musique françoise contre M. Rousseau (1754), the Abbé Laugier wrote that Lalande 'produced nothing that was not extremely well worked (travaillé). One senses that he returned many times to his motets and that he touched and retouched them'. If the dates in an Avignon manuscript (F-A MS 5840) are to be trusted, 28 of Lalande's motets (more than a third of the total) date from the period 1680–91, which includes the first eight years of his tenure at the royal chapel. From other sources we know that another three motets are from this early period. Of this total of 31, 27 are in the 1689–90 Philidor copy at Versailles (one, Audite coeli, in two versions, showing that the composer's lifelong habit of revision started early). This collection, then, may be said to represent Lalande's early style. These works are referred to in the 'Discours' as follows: 'The first compositions of Mr De La Lande are not as well worked as the last pieces; they are more simple than profound and are less the fruits of Art than of Nature'.



Most of the 'Philidor' motets to some extent exploit the vertical sonorities and syllabic treatment of text that characterize the earlier Versailles motets of Du Mont, Lully and Robert. Although some influence from French stage music may be observed in such a binary air as 'Asperges me' or a rondeau air such as 'Amplius lava me' (both from the Miserere), many récits, often accompanied by five-part strings, are open-ended and elide or alternate with choral sections. The large four- and five-part choruses are generally homophonic. On the other hand, a shift towards a more polyphonic style may be seen in such a chorus as 'Ascendit Deus in jubilo' from Omnes gentes. In his polyphonic choral settings in the 'Philidor' motets, Lalande often represented two independent and clearly defined motifs in a solo récit (or an opening symphonie) and then combined them in a chorus. In the hymn Veni Creator spiritus the music assigned in the opening tenor récit to each part of the paired text of the fifth verset, 'Hostem repellas longius, Pacemque dones protinus', is quite different; these two are then combined in a ten-voice double chorus. A similar practice is used in the Miserere where the two motifs occurring in succession in the introductory symphonie are worked together in the chorus that follows, the second motif being used as a countersubject to the first. In Lalande's later music such textual counterpoint is used with much subtlety. In the eighth verset of De profundis, 'Et ipse redimet Israel, Ex omnibus iniquitatibus ejus', two motifs are used to represent the two parts of the text (ex.1); motif a ascends and b descends. They were clearly chosen for use either consecutively or simultaneously. Most tutti passages combine the motifs and their respective texts, as here; to assure the comprehensibility of the text Lalande restricted the opening and the end of the movement to the first and second lines respectively.

In the 'Philidor' motets the orchestra usually doubles the voices of the grand choeur and supplies five-part symphonies or three-part ritournelles to mark structural divisions. But, like Du Mont, Lalande allowed the second violin to elaborate the vocal line in free counterpoint. Occasionally, especially in slow-moving choruses, the orchestra is independent of the voice parts (in 'Exultat cantico' from Christe Redemptor omnium, for example).

Clearly, Lalande suffered a crisis of conflicting styles soon after the turn of the century. Changes were taking place in French stage music by such post-Lully composers as Campra, Destouches, Mouret and Montéclair; French composers had to come to terms with the Italian cantatas and sonatas 'that have flooded all Paris' (Mercure galant, 1714). In spite of his absorption in the style of the Versailles motet, Lalande was no stranger to Italian music. The italophile Nicolas Mathieu, curé of St André-des-Arts, had established weekly concerts in his home before the turn of the century where 'only Latin music composed in Italy' was performed. Lalande and Charpentier were both part of the coterie surrounding the Abbé Mathieu, and it was Lalande who inherited his collection of cantatas and motets.

A stylistic and chronological gap separates the Philidor copies of 1689–90 from the 1729 engraving. The Toulouse-Philidor copies of 1704 and certain isolated Philidor motet manuscripts at Versailles may be considered representative of a transition period. In the 17 years that separate the Count of Toulouse copy of Super flumina Babylonis from the original version in the Philidor Versailles collection, Lalande substituted an extended concert 'aria' with flute obbligato ('Ad hereat lingua') for the earlier récit for soprano accompanied by five-part strings. This is already an 'ingenious disparity' ('Discours'), as is the elegant duo 'Laudate, laudate Dominum' for two sopranos and obbligato violin in Laudate Dominum, which comes from the Philidor atelier and dates from 1700 (F-V Mus 24).

The 1729 engraved edition and the Cauvin manuscript together offer the most complete picture of the grands motets of the mature Lalande. The revisions documented in these sources take the following forms: (1) the change from a loosely organized structure with elided sectional divisions to autonomous movements (solos and ensembles interspersed between choruses), resembling the so-called reform cantatas of Bach or the Restoration anthems of Humfrey or Purcell; (2) the creation out of simple récits with five-part homophonic accompaniment of elaborate concert 'arias' or duos, often accompanied by obbligato instruments; (3) the changing of predominantly homophonic choruses into more polyphonic ones; (4) the change from an orchestra primarily doubling choral lines to one independent of the voices; and (5) greater economy in the use of some material while other material is expanded. The 'Requiem aeternam' from De profundis is a fine example of the fifth category. The Philidor version includes a symphonie of 14 bars, a solo récit of eight bars, a second symphonie of six bars and a basically homophonic chorus of 31 bars up to 'Et lux perpetua' (ex.2*a*). In the 1729 edition there is only one symphonie, of nine bars, which merges with a 53-bar chorus up to 'Et lux perpetua'. The writing is dense, five-part polyphony of Bach-like intensity in which both instruments and voices participate (ex.2*b*). The harmony in Lalande's late works may owe something to his exposure to Charpentier's music. The dissonant chord of the mediant 9th with major 7th and augmented 5th, found in the music of Charpentier, is also heard in the motets of his younger contemporary (ex.3, bars 2 and 7). Like Rameau, Lalande found the diminished 7th chord compellingly dramatic. In Pange lingua (ex.3) his coupling of this chord with an indicated

'silence' shows the care with which he chose the most effective musical setting for the text.

The motets common to the engraved edition and the Cauvin manuscripts vary greatly in the number of sections they have. Regina coeli laetare is the shortest, with only six sections (symphonie, duo, chorus, recitative, trio, chorus); the Miserere, on the other hand, has a total of 15, including eight récits, and the Te Deum has 18. A symmetrical ordering of sections, like that found in many Bach cantatas, is rare; only Deus noster refugium approaches an alternation of récit and chorus. However, outside these collections, in Dies irae (1690/1711), the composer exploits in dramatic fashion the contrasts inherent in the 18 rhyming stanzas and final couplet of the 13th-century poem. His strong formal sense is evident in the organization of the 18 stanzas into four groups of four framing a central group of two. The two larger groups nearer the centre are each assigned a solo voice (haute-contre, then basse-taille), while the others employ a variety of solo and choral textures. The work is framed in plainchant, with the opening 'Dies irae' sung by unison sopranos and the concluding 'Pie Jesu' in a web of counterpoint of simple yet awesome beauty. In 11 grands motets Lalande used the traditional opening formula of the Versailles motets – that is, the sharing of the same thematic material by symphonie, récit and chorus. In seven instances Lalande introduced his motet with an autonomous récit; Quare fremuerunt gentes begins with two. More than half the récits found in the engraved edition and in the Cauvin manuscripts are in some sort of binary form, including examples of the type A–B–B′, the most common binary configuration in the stage music of the Lully and post-Lully generation; in this type of air, the text is usually a quatrain. In the B′ section the textual repetition never gives rise to an exact musical repetition although note values and melodic shape may be similar. The example below shows the relationship between text and music in the récit 'Quae utilitas in sanguine meo' from the tenth verset of Exaltabo te, Domine:

Quae utilitas in sanguine meo,
Dum descendo in corruptionem? A:I–V

Numquid confitebitur tibi pulvis,
Aut annuntiabit veritatem tuam? B:V–ii

Numquid confitebitur tibi pulvis,
Aut annuntiabit veritatem tuam? B′:I–I

Operatic influence is also seen in the more than ten récits scored for high voice (soprano or haute-contre) 'accompanied' by two flutes, by two violins or by a combination of the two without continuo. There are more than 20 récits with a striking resemblance to the extended arias found in French cantatas or opéra-ballets; these, with their elaborate melismas, chains of sequences and vocal displays ('Qui posuit' from Lauda Jerusalem and 'Jubilate Deo' from Cantate Domino s72 even have cadenzas for soprano and oboe), mark the most radical break with the past. Surprisingly, there are only two genuine da capo arias in the 40 motets of the engraved edition and the Cauvin manuscripts: most récits of this type are in rondeau form (A–B–A′), with modifications in the return of A.

To appreciate the extent to which Lalande had absorbed the new italianate style in his religious music, one need only compare a récit of an early motet with the same récit as revised in the engraved edition and Cauvin. Ex.4*a* shows 'Hodie si vocem ejus' from Venite, exultemus Domino as it appears in an early 18th-century copy from Philidor's atelier (F-V Mus 25); the heavy five-part accompaniment is mostly homophonic, following note-against-note the baritone's vocal line. In ex.4*b* the conception is totally different; we have a highly developed aria for soprano with violin obbligato.

In certain of his late motets Lalande exposed the texts of several versets in a succession of short movements, much as Lully or Campra constructed an operatic scene from short dialogue airs interspersed with recitatives. This scena-like procedure may be seen in Confitemini, where there is a succession of five movements for dessus, Domine in virtute tua (nine movements for basse-taille), Cantate Domino s72 (seven movements for dessus) and Exultate justi in Domino, where three airs for haute-contre (interrupted by a brief recitative) are followed by two for dessus, each on two lines of text.

It is not certain that the 1729 engraved edition represents an accurate final version of Lalande's motets as performed at the royal chapel or at the Concert Spirituel; what is clear is that the omission of the inner orchestral parts as found in the Cauvin manuscripts was no more and no less than the custom for such engraved editions from the last decade of the 17th century onwards (for example, all Rameau's published operas were in this form, even though we know from surviving manuscript materials that they were performed in full scoring). Less than six weeks after his death, on 25 July 1726, Lalande's widow requested a royal patent to engrave her husband's motets. The first two motets were done 'chez Jacques Collombat' in 1728 (although the edition carries the date of 1729). Despite the assertions of several modern writers, there is no evidence that Collin de Blamont had any active part in preparing the engraved edition. Indeed the circumstantial evidence argues against such a contribution. In the 'Notice' at the end of the preface Tannevot explained that to give the public a general idea of Lalande's music he invited Collin de Blamont to write an avertissement because the close relationship the latter had with Lalande put him in a better position than anybody to analyse his music, and Collin de Blamont's letter (dated 28 September 1728, just before the first volume was printed) is the result. The letter opens with the claim that he has 'just learnt . . . of the good offices which you [Tannevot] wish to perform in memory of the late M. De La Lande' and says he is 'only too happy if this can be of some use to you in your project'. Clearly, Collin de Blamont would not have written this after two years of work on the edition if he had been closely involved in the project as musical editor, especially when one considers his character as betrayed in the well-documented quarrel between the sous-maîtres and the surintendants (see Benoit, Dufourcq and Massip, 1986).

It seems obvious that there must have been musicians involved in the work, since the full scores were not reduced by simply omitting the viola parts; in many passages the reduced orchestral score is a skilful reduction of the full score. The widespread substitution in the edition of the time signature 2 for ¢ and modifications to 'expressive' indications make the edition quite distinct from all surviving manuscript material and suggest 'musical' intervention before, or in the course of, the engraving process. Indeed, Titon du Tillet (Le Parnasse françois, 1732) stated that Lalande's widow, 'attentive to everything that may do honour to the memory of her late husband, having entrusted his motets to musicians who were very knowledgeable and also friends of the deceased, began in 1728 to have them engraved'. But, whoever these musicians were, it seems probable from the Avertissement that Collin de Blamont was not among them. Despite his close ties with Lalande, there is no need to credit Collin de Blamont with a part in the composition of these eloquent statements of the mature Lalande. A study of his own extant religious music reveals none of the intensity of expression or skilful polyphonic manipulation found in several of the choruses in the engraved edition of Lalande's motets. Collin de Blamont's letter has the ring of sincerity:

> I have been too much his servant and friend, and have received too many marks of his esteem and kindness through the pains he took with my education from my tenderest youth, not to sacrifice something of my own self-interest in daring to put this in writing. I can instruct you in all the perfection I have recognized in this Latin Lully.

3. Secular vocal and stage works. Lalande's stage and concert works were written between 1682 and 1704, apart from a Divertissement sur la Paix in 1713 and the three ballets for Louis XV in 1720–21. He wrote some 24 ballets, divertissements, intermèdes and pastorales to entertain royalty at Versailles, Marly, Fontainebleau and Sceaux, and occasionally in Paris, including those for Louis XV. The music for only six of these works survives in complete form, but that for another four can be almost completely reconstructed. For nine others, excerpts and/or librettos give an outline of the work, and two survive as librettos only.

Lalande's Ballet de la jeunesse, performed at Versailles on 28 January 1686 as a substitute for Lully's unfinished Armide, is a synthesis between opera and ballet, and an important precursor of the opéra-ballet; its long poem is divided into three episodes, devoted respectively to Mercury, Pallas and Tircis, and the music includes eight symphonies, 14 airs, 15 choruses and 18 dances, these last including a central 'Chaconne de la jeunesse' with 61 variations on the eight-bar bass, showing how Lalande, like Lully, was able to organize an entire scene around the chaconne pattern (the theme and 28 variations are instrumental, and the remaining music is for vocal solo, ensemble and chorus).

The pastorale L'Amour fléchi par la Constance, the full score of which came to light in 1974, was first performed at Fontainebleau in 1697, in the presence of the exiled James II and Mary of Modena. This work displays a formal strength akin to that which Lalande skilfully deploys in his grands motets. Scenes consisting mainly of solo récits and duos alternate with three consisting of divertissements of choruses and dances. The two most substantial récits occur in Scene 1, 'Tant qu'a duré la nuit', where the two stanzas are each followed by the same sommeil ('sleep symphony'), and in Scene 3, where a récit with a florid violin obbligato, 'Doux calme de la solitude', is also in two stanzas, the second of which is an elaborately written-out ornamented double. Scene 5 forms the centre of the work with an impressive passacaille of 221 bars, of which the last 56 are mainly vocal, framed by a chorus. The ninth and final scene consists of an air 'grave et piqué', in the style of the first section of an ouverture, a sarabande (danced and sung) and a vigorous shepherds' chorus.

Two years later Lalande again collaborated with his librettist of the Ballet de la jeunesse, Dancourt (Florent Carton), this time to provide a series of intermèdes for Dancourt's play Les fées, given first at Fontainebleau and then at the Comédie Française in Paris. Fairy stories and plays built around them were a popular genre in the last decade of the century, and Dancourt, the most fashionable story-teller and actor of his day (he was patronized by the dauphin), responded to the trend. Lalande's contributions are among his most sparkling and colourful, and he went on to re-use much of the material in later works.

For the first court ballet danced by Louis XV at the Tuileries, in February 1720, Lalande set to music Dancourt's revised intermèdes for L'inconnu. He included some movements by Rebel and Destouches, and himself supplied the overture (revised from his 1703 'supper' suites), 35 airs de danse and some of his most adventurous vocal ariettes. On 31 December 1721 Les élémens, 'Troisieme Ballet danse par le Roy dans son Palais des Tuileries', was first performed. Lalande and Destouches collaborated on this court ballet, which with several revisions reached the Paris Opéra in May 1725 as an opéra-ballet and went on to become one of the most performed works in the repertory of that house. The distribution of labour between Lalande and Destouches remained a carefully guarded secret, but there is little doubt that most of the music is by Destouches. In a letter to Prince Antoine I of Monaco, Destouches wrote:

> My amour propre has been flattered by the praise you give to the Ballet des Elémens. I share the glory of pleasing you with M. de La Lande. We were ordered to work on it together. He contributed some very beautiful things the details concerning which I must pray you not [to ask me] to divulge because he has insisted that we were both covered by the same cloak.

The only clue as to Lalande's contribution is found in the table of 'Airs tirés des autres Divertissemens et Ballets' in the manuscript collection of Simphonies de M. De La Lande (F-Pc Rés.581), where, under the title Ballet des Elémens, the overture, five items from the prologue and four items from Act 1 are listed as by Lalande.

4. Symphonies and caprices. The earliest and most intimate of Lalande's instrumental suites independent of those extracted from the ballets is the Grande pièce royale, known later as the Deuxième Fantaisie ou Caprice, subtitled 'which the king often asked for'. First found in a Philidor recueil dated 1695 (F-Pc Rés.F.533), it is in six movements designated only by varied tempo indications. The obbligatos for bassoon include a sustained e′, a pitch not exceeded until the late 1740s in Rameau's operas. Of the other suites or caprices which are independent of the ballets, the Caprice en passacaille (S164/14) also contains obbligatos for bassoons, while the Troisième Caprice (S162/18) is imaginatively scored for a quartet of violins, violas, bassoons and continuo; both the viola part and the figuring of the continuo are attributed to Lalande's brother-in-law 'M. Rebel'. The work includes a fine set of free variations in concerto scoring. Contrary to normal procedures, its tutti sections rather than its solo sections increase in complexity. Quite different in character is the Concert de trompettes (S158/1–6, 20), outdoor music to accompany processions on the canals and lakes of the Versailles gardens, five movements of which are first found in the Ballet pour le jour de Saint-Louis (1691). The year 1695 also saw the first printed publications containing Lalande's music, one a collection of 12 Airs italiens assembled by Fossard and Philidor mostly from Italian operas, for six of which Lalande wrote ritournelles (S174: preludes for two dessus instruments and continuo).

The first of five (possibly six) collections of instrumental music and excerpts from ballets was made in 1703, entitled Les symphonies de M. de La Lande 'which were usually played at the king's supper' by the 'troupe des petits violons'. Its four part books were copied on the order of the Count of Toulouse by Philidor l'aîné and contain ten suites totalling 160 movements (F-Pc Rés.582). Of these almost half have their origins in stage works. A decade later, a collection, of which only the index survives, shows that while nine movements had been dropped another 34 were added, 23 of them from the ballets, together with the Troisième Caprice, making 185 movements in all. Two posthumous collections (F-Pn Vm[7]3077 and Pc Rés.581, the latter a true manuscript de luxe) both show strong evidence of reliance on material contemporary with the composer, and were probably copied from an earlier collection now lost. They include almost all the material of the 1703 and 1713 collections together with more than 100 additional movements from the ballets. Of the grand total of 300 movements, some 206 are from known stage works. In these two late collections, almost identical in content, the movements are reordered so that they are grouped by keys into 18 suites, three of which (nos.6–8) are the three caprices, while the Concert de trompettes is incorporated into suite no.4; interior movements are often in related keys. Following the suites in volume one of these late collections are the Symphonies des Noëls, settings of traditional French carol melodies 'which were played in the king's chapel on Christmas night'.

Lalauni, Lila [Julia] (b Athens, 9 June ?1910; d Paris, 12 Feb 1996). Greek pianist and composer. Granddaughter of the composer Timotheos Xanthopoulos and a child prodigy, she entered the Vienna Music Academy in 1927. She studied the piano until 1930, and then composition with Robert Konta, graduating in 1934. She later took lessons privately with Dupré in Paris, where she settled. Lalauni became known primarily as a brilliant pianist; she made her début in Vienna as early as 1930. Four years later she performed Richard Strauss's Burleske, with the composer conducting. Although her international performing career overshadowed her achievements as a composer, some of her works, especially her piano concertos, were occasionally performed in Greece. Stylistically, her compositions move between late Romanticism and neo-classicism and betray a genuine lyrical gift exercised with emotional restraint. Indeed in terms of technique, let alone inspiration, she ranks among the best Greek composers of her generation. In her final years, poor eyesight forced her to abandon composition.

La Laurencie, (Marie-Bertrand-)Lionel(-Jules) de (b Nantes, 24 July 1861; d Paris, 21 Nov 1933). French musicologist. He took degrees in law and sciences at Nantes and studied at the Collège Stanislas, Paris, and the Ecole des Eaux et Forêts, Nancy (1881–3); concurrently he was taught the violin by Léon Reynier and theory by Alphonse Weingartner and studied with Bourgault-Ducoudray at the Paris Conservatoire (1891–2). He learnt the Classical repertory through regular domestic quartet playing, which he continued to the end of his life. In 1898 he abandoned a promising government administrative career to devote himself to music; he gave popular lecture courses (mainly at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes) on music history and aesthetics (1906–33), also serving as the archivist and librarian (1905–14) and vice-president (from 1914) of the Paris section of the International Musical Society. In 1917 he founded the Société Française de Musicologie, of which he became president (1924–5, 1932). He succeeded Lavignac as editor of the Encyclopédie de la musique et dictionnaire du Conservatoire in 1919.

Although La Laurencie turned to professional musicology comparatively late, he had early served an apprenticeship in letters as the list of his writings shows. To his new career he brought a solid musical grounding and a boundless enthusiasm for a wide range of subjects to which was added precision of thought derived from legal and scientific studies. To complete his training, he acquired an unrivalled skill in archival investigation at the Ecole des Chartes. Notwithstanding an immense output he showed minute attention to detail and documentation, and yet wore his knowledge lightly enough to rivet the reader's attention.

La Laurencie's main area of study, French music from Lully to Gluck, is the theme of a well-balanced contribution to Lavignac's Encyclopédie. For the scholar he compiled a thematic index (Fonds Blancheton) and a library catalogue (Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal); other books cater for the general reader, such as Orphée (which views Gluck's opera from every angle) and his shorter books on Lully and Rameau. Of special importance is his extended survey on the French symphony (in collaboration with Saint-Foix). L'école française de violon, the result of over 20 years' research, is his masterpiece and dwarfs all similar works. In this work, La Laurencie's apology for a certain monotony is too modest in view of the vivid manner of presentation, the abundance of musical examples and footnotes which in themselves would constitute a book, the whole capped by an exhaustive set of appendices. The first two volumes are chronologically devoted to composers and their works, while the third deals with violin manuals, techniques, theorists and teachers, and the evolution of French instrumental music. This work and the study of the symphony, with Barry Brook's La symphonie française (1962), form a remarkable trilogy covering the whole spectrum of French concerted music from Lully to the Revolution.

Lalli, (Benedetto) Domenico [Biancardi, (Nicolò) Sebastiano] (b Naples, 27 March 1679; d Venice, 9 Oct 1741). Italian librettist. He fled from Naples in 1706, when he was accused of having taken money from the treasury of the brotherhood of the Annunziata, where he had been employed. Seeking refuge in Rome, he met the composer Emanuele d'Astorga, and together they wandered throughout Italy. He adopted the pseudonym Domenico Lalli in 1709. In Venice between 1710 and 1718 Lalli wrote librettos for the Teatro S Cassiano and, probably from 1719, was impresario at the S Samuele and S Giovanni Grisostomo theatres. In the early 1720s he worked at the archiepiscopal court at Salzburg, and from 1727 to 1740 served as court poet to the Elector of Bavaria. During these years he made the acquaintance of Metastasio and Goldoni, and the latter often praised him for his 'poetic genius'. He had previously enjoyed the friendship and support of Apostolo Zeno.

One of Lalli's greatest achievements was in 1711, when his Elisa (with music by G.M. Ruggieri) became the first comic opera to be performed in Venice. In fact opera buffa had existed as early as 1706 in Naples (Faggioli's La Cilla), and at least one scholar considers that the text of Elisa may have been taken from an even earlier Neapolitan comedy by Niccolò Amenta (see Scherillo). Yet regardless of where Lalli acquired his understanding of the genre, and despite the fact that comic opera did not flourish in Venice until later, his importance lay in the initial step he took in presenting comic opera to the Venetians. With the exception of Elisa most of his librettos adhered faithfully to the 18th-century convention of developing character relationships. These texts were first set by such composers as Francesco Gasparini, Mancini, Vivaldi, Albinoni, Alessandro Scarlatti, Leo and Porpora. In addition, Lalli adapted texts by Minato, Zeno and Metastasio which were set by Hasse and Galuppi, and he also wrote texts and some music for serenatas, cantatas, festive occasions, dedications and sacred and other works.

Lallouette [Lalouette], Jean (Baptiste) François (b Paris, 1651; d Paris, 31 Aug 1728). French composer. He was trained at the choir school of St Eustache, Paris, and studied the violin with Guy Leclerc and composition with Lully. Lully appointed him as his secretary and as time-beater at the Opéra and asked him to fill in the inner parts of certain of his works. When he reportedly boasted of having written some of the best parts of Lully's Isis (1677) he was dismissed. Isis, however, displeased Louis XIV because of its thinly disguised and unflattering portrayal of Mme de Montespan in the character of Juno. The work was withdrawn, not to be performed again until 1704, and Philippe Quinault, the librettist, was dismissed. Lully came through the affair unscathed, and one must wonder if Lallouette was a scapegoat. On 18 April 1678 he was appointed to the Savoy court at Turin as composer of French music and director of the band of violins. He was dismissed in July 1679, possibly because in over a year he had produced only one composition, a three-part serenata performed on 14 May 1678. He probably returned to Paris, where he soon composed an opera; on 27 January 1681 the king's secretary wrote to a M. de la Régnie informing him that the king forbade further performances of it on the grounds that it violated Lully's privilege. Lallouette competed unsuccessfully in April 1683 for one of the four positions of sous-maître at the royal chapel. The post was awarded to Pascal Collasse, who had succeeded him as Lully's secretary; it is likely that Lully intervened on Collasse's behalf and against Lallouette.

Little is known of Lallouette's activities from 1683 to 1693. He paid a visit to Rome in 1689 and while he was there composed a concerto in the Italian style which was performed at least once. It is established that in 1692 he was living near St Germain-l'Auxerrois, Paris, and he may have been employed there. On 7 December 1693 he was made choirmaster of Rouen Cathedral, defeating Nicolas Bernier for the post; he remained there until 15 February 1695. There is disagreement on his whereabouts between 1695 and 1700. One source has him at St Germain-l'Auxerrois from September 1695 and busy with a four-act opera, Europe; another has him at Notre Dame, Versailles, in 1695–7 and at St Germain-l'Auxerrois only in 1697–8. Those that have him at St Germain-l'Auxerrois from 1693 to 1700 or maintain that he went from Rouen to Notre Dame, Paris, in 1695 are undoubtedly in error. On 17 November 1700, however, he certainly was appointed to succeed Campra as choirmaster of Notre Dame, Paris. He asked to be released in 1716, claiming fatigue, although the chapter had given him unprecedented yearly vacations and in 1706 had even employed an assistant so that he could be absent frequently. His resignation was accepted, and he was made a canon of St Jean-le-Rond. Early in 1718, however, he asked to be reinstated as choirmaster, asserting that his music was not being well performed; he resumed his duties on 5 March. His Miserere was performed at the Concert Spirituel in 1726. He finally retired on 22 January 1727 and he was allotted a yearly pension of 400 livres. On 9 July 1727 the chapter accepted the gift of all his music to be placed in the archives.

Lallouette was in his day a respected and popular musician and teacher. His works were thought to be well composed and to display a certain originality, although the sacred music was said to suffer from his faulty knowledge of Latin. It bears witness to two influences. On the one hand Italian cantatas seem to have prompted the alternation of vocal and instrumental sections, the rise of certain forms and textures (which derive also from the trio sonata), and the tendency towards stereotyped figuration; on the other hand he sometimes seems consciously to refer to the great Versailles motets of Lalande.

Lalo, Charles (b Périgueux, 24 Feb 1877; d Paris, 1 April 1953). French aesthetician. He studied philosophy and aesthetics in Bayonne and in Paris, where he took the doctorate in 1908 with two dissertations, on contemporary experimental aesthetics and on his own theory of musical aesthetics. After teaching philosophy at the University of Bordeaux and various leading secondary schools, he succeeded Victor Basch as lecturer in aesthetics and art history at the Sorbonne (1933–53). He was president of the Société Française d'Esthétique, and one of the directors of the Revue d'esthétique. Throughout his writings (which deal with sociology and logic as well as general aesthetics) he insisted that aesthetics is a scientific discipline that must be based on facts, on an examination of the mathematical, psychological, physiological and sociological aspects of the beautiful rather than on theory or criticism; and that the components of a musical (or any artistic) structure are interdependent parts of the organic whole and cannot be assessed in isolation.

Lalo, Edouard(-Victoire-Antoine) (b Lille, 27 Jan 1823; d Paris, 22 April 1892). French composer. His father had fought for Napoleon and although the name was originally Spanish, the family had been settled in Flanders and northern France since the 16th century. Lalo's parents at first encouraged musical studies and he learnt both the violin and the cello at the Lille Conservatoire, but his more serious inclinations towards music met with stern military opposition from his father. This reaction compelled Lalo to leave home at the age of 16 to pursue his talent in Paris. He attended Habeneck's violin class at the Paris Conservatoire for a brief period and studied composition privately with the pianist Julius Schulhoff and the composer J.-E. Crèvecoeur. For a long while he worked in obscurity, making his living as a violinist and teacher. He became friendly with Delacroix and played in some of Berlioz's concerts. He was also composing and two early symphonies were apparently destroyed. In the late 1840s he published some romances in the manner of the day and some violin pieces; his inclination was, unfashionably, towards chamber music. By 1853 he had composed two piano trios, a medium almost entirely neglected in France at the time. The revival of interest in chamber music in France in the 1850s owed much to Lalo, for he was a founder-member of the Armingaud Quartet, formed in 1855 with the aim of making better known the quartets of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and also of Mendelssohn and Schumann; Lalo played the viola and later second violin. His own string quartet dates from 1859.

A period of discouragement then ensued and Lalo wrote little until 1866 when, at the age of 43, he embarked on an opera in response to a competition set up by the Théâtre-Lyrique. His Fiesque, a grand opera in three acts to a libretto by Charles Beauquier after Schiller's play Fiesco, was not awarded the prize and, despite interest shown by both the Paris Opéra and the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, it was never performed. Lalo was embittered by these refusals and had the vocal score published at his own expense. He valued the work highly and drew on it for numerous later compositions, including the scherzo of the Symphony in G minor, the two Aubades for small orchestra, the Divertissement, Néron and other works.

Lalo's fame as a composer was greatly widened in the 1870s by the performance of a series of important instrumental works. The formation of the Société Nationale and the support of Pasdeloup, Lamoureux, Colonne, Sarasate and others gave Lalo an opportunity to pursue his ambitions as a composer of orchestral music in an essentially German tradition. The F major violin concerto was played by Sarasate in 1874 and the Symphonie espagnole, also by Sarasate, the following year. His cello concerto was played by Fischer in 1877 and the Fantaisie norvégienne in 1878. The Concerto russe for violin was first played by Marsick in 1879. Despite this highly productive period devoted to orchestral music, the composition of Fiesque had satisfied Lalo that he should continue to seek success in the theatre and in 1875 he began work on a libretto by Edouard Blau based on a Breton legend, Le roi d'Ys. By 1881 it was substantially completed and extracts had been heard in concerts. But no theatre accepted it, and the Opéra, perhaps as consolation for turning it down, asked Lalo instead for a ballet ('a genre that I know nothing about', he admitted) to be completed in four months. Namouna was composed in 1881–2 (when Lalo suffered an attack of hemiplegia Gounod helped with the orchestration) and played at the Opéra the following year. The production was beset with intrigue and survived only a few performances. Lalo's music was variously criticized as that of a symphonist or a Wagnerian or both, but the more discerning critics appreciated its freshness and originality. Debussy, then a student at the Conservatoire, remained an enthusiastic admirer of the score and it became popular in the form of a series of orchestral suites.

More orchestral works followed, notably the symphony and the piano concerto, but Lalo's main attention was given to the production of his masterpiece Le roi d'Ys, finally mounted at the Opéra-Comique on 7 May 1888. It was an overwhelming success and for the remaining four years of his life Lalo finally enjoyed the general acclaim he had sought for so long. Although he worked on two more stage works, the pantomime Néron staged at the Hippodrome in 1891 and La jacquerie, an opera of which he completed only one act, both drew almost entirely on earlier compositions; his productive life was essentially over. In 1865 Lalo had married one of his pupils, Julie de Maligny – a singer of Breton origin; their son was Pierre Lalo.

Although Lalo's fame has rested, in France at least, on Le roi d'Ys, his instrumental music must be accorded a more prominent historical importance, for it represents a decisively new direction in French music at that period, taken more or less simultaneously by César Franck and Saint-Saëns. Outside France the Symphonie espagnole, a violin concerto in five movements using Spanish idioms and whimsically entitled symphony, has remained his most popular work; the freshness of its melodic and orchestral language is imperishable. The cello concerto is on the whole a stronger and more searching work, with a central movement that combines slow movement and scherzo as Brahms was wont to do, and a forward momentum, especially in the first movement, of exceptional power. In his Symphony it is the two central movements, a scherzo and an adagio (both drawn from earlier music) which carry the weight of the argument. The piano concerto is disappointing, but the string quartet, composed in 1859 and revised in 1880, and the second piano trio are both works that deserve to be heard more frequently.

The opera Fiesque is encumbered with a libretto laden with absurdities and awkward stage manoeuvres, belonging in spirit to the age of Scribe. Yet for a first opera the music is extraordinarily deft and varied, occasionally pompous but never dull, and full of brilliantly successful numbers. The Divertissement, drawn from the opera, is one of Lalo's most effective orchestral pieces. Le roi d'Ys is a fine opera too, with some borrowing of the conventional scenes of grand opera, such as the offstage organ with ethereal voices. Margared is well characterized, especially in her expressions of anxiety or horror, and Rozenn has music of winning tenderness. The choral music is less convincing, for Lalo seems inadequate to the task of collective characterization except when the chorus are being conventionally decorative, as for example in the exquisite wedding scene. The opera has considerable dramatic force and a genuine individuality of style.

Many of Lalo's songs were written for his wife's contralto voice. They form a more sentimental, lyrical part of his output in notable contrast to the instrumental music. His gift in this area was already evident in the Six romances populaires of 1849 and the Hugo settings of 1856.

Lalo's style is robust and forceful with fresh rhythmic and harmonic invention. He was accused, like all progressive composers of his time, of imitating Wagner but although he admired Wagner, their styles have little in common. As Lalo himself said: 'It's hard enough doing my own kind of music and making sure that it's good enough. If I started to do someone else's I'm sure it would be appalling'. His favourite harmonic colour is the so-called French 6th, which is almost overused, but he did turn harmonic progression to fine effect as a source of forward momentum. His orchestration is noisy but ingenious; Namouna is a particularly skilful score. He had an evident fondness for scherzo movements in 6/8, 3/8 and even 3/16. Another hallmark is a recurring emphatic chord (often an octave), fortissimo, commonly on an unexpected beat of the bar; in his orchestral music this mannerism can be brusque or crude in effect. His temperament was naturally tuned to the styles of Mendelssohn and Schumann on which he superimposed a variety of colours, sometimes drawn from folk idioms of Scandinavia, Russia, Brittany or Spain. All his music has a vigour and energy that place it in striking contrast to the music of Franck's pupils on the one hand and the impressionists on the other. His kinship is more with the Russians, especially Borodin, and with Smetana, than with composers of his own country, although it is not difficult to find traces of his influence in Dukas and Debussy and perhaps more distinctly in Roussel.

HUGH MACDONALD

Lalo, Pierre (b Puteaux, 6 Sept 1866; d Paris, 9 June 1943). French music critic, son of EDOUARD LALO. He was a brilliant student of literature, classics, philosophy and, at the Ecole Nationale des Chartes and the Ecole Polytechnique, modern languages. From 1896 he contributed for some time to the Journal des débats before making his mark as a music critic with an article on d'Indy's Fervaal in the Revue de Paris (v, 1898, pp.438–48); this secured him the post of critic of Le temps (in succession to Johannès Weber), which he held from October 1898 until 1914. Lalo's articles in that paper, and in Courrier musical and Comoedia, are characterized by conservatism, wit, astuteness and a linguistic finesse which occasionally turned to virulence: his diatribes against 'Debussyism' (Le temps, 21 Feb 1906) were heavily sarcastic and his preoccupation with the supposed influence of Debussy on Ravel (see the review of Histoires naturelles entitled 'Maurice Ravel et le Debussysme', Le temps, 19 March 1907) was an important feature of the journalistic cause célèbre that largely caused the strained relations between the two men. Lalo was later a member of the governing bodies of the Paris Conservatoire and the Radiodiffusion Française.

Lalouette, Jean François. See LALLOUETTE, JEAN FRANÇOIS.

Laloy, Louis (b Gray, Haute-Saône, 18 Feb 1874; d Dôle, 4 March 1944). French musicologist and critic. He was a pupil at the Ecole Normale Supérieure (1893), gaining the agrégé des lettres (1896) and docteur ès lettres (1904); he also studied at the Schola Cantorum with d'Indy, Bordes and others (1899–1905). He contributed as editor-in-chief ('without title', as he said later) to Combarieu's Revue musicale from 1901, and in 1905 founded, with Jean Marnold, the Mercure musical which Ecorcheville later transformed into the Bulletin français de la S.I.M. He was also co-founder of the short-lived Année musicale (1911–13) and an influential music critic of the Grande revue, the Gazette des beaux-arts and (from 1930) the Revue des deux mondes. In 1906–7 he lectured on music history at the Sorbonne while Romain Rolland was on leave. He served as secretary general of the Paris Opéra from 1914 and was professor of music history at the Paris Conservatoire (1936–41).

Laloy was a cultured man whose interests included the music of ancient Greece (discussed in his dissertation) and that of East Asia: he lectured on Chinese music at the Sorbonne from 1921 and wrote the libretto for Roussel's Padmâvatî. Though his work at the Schola Cantorum led to a book on Rameau, Laloy was a noted defender of contemporary French music and was a close friend of, and mediator between, Ravel and Debussy, with whom he collaborated on some unrealized stage works; he was also the author of the first major work (and the first in the French language) on Debussy.

Lam. Southern Lao and north-eastern Thai term for vocal music (the central and northern Lao equivalent is khap), used particularly to designate melodies that are generated from the speech tones of the text. See LAOS, §1.

Lam, Doming(os) [Lam Ngok-pui] (b Macau, 5 Aug 1926). Macanese composer and teacher. Brought up in Macau, his first exposure to music was through singing in church choirs and the lessons of Salesian missionaries. Moving to Hong Kong at the age of 23, he began to study music and learn the violin privately, and though self-taught, he gained entry to the Royal Conservatory in Toronto (1954–8). He gained a composition diploma there, then moved to the University of Southern California (1960–63) to study with Rózsa. He continued to keep abreast of developments in avant-garde music, and from the mid-1960s to the early 70s he became known as Hong Kong's first full-time native composer. In 1973 he co-founded the Asian Composers' League, serving as its secretary-general (1980–90). He was composer-in-residence and a lecturer at Hong Kong University (1986–94); in 1988 the governor of Macau decorated him for services to the arts. In 1994 he moved to Toronto.

The earlier stages of Lam's music show two trends: atmospheric settings of Chinese texts, such as the ever-popular Li Bai songs (1957), and a neo-classical instrumental style, reminiscent of Bartók, as in the violin sonata Oriental Pearl (1961), which echoes Cantonese opera and employs pipa fingerings. With the founding of the Hong Kong Chinese Orchestra in the late 1970s, he gained a laboratory for the study of Chinese instruments; the first result of this enduring collaboration was Autumn Execution (1978). Two other pieces, Thanksgiving to Joe-Kwan (1976) and Insect World I (1979), a delightful suite rich in onomatopoeic effects and aimed at children, made his reputation both in Asia and in the West. Both works use Western techniques in a Chinese context and reflect the joyful brashness associated with life in Hong Kong. An increasing amalgamation of his Western background with his experience of Chinese music characterizes his later works, notably in the song cycle Like is Their Delight (1980) for dramatic soprano and Chinese instruments. In the 1990s, following a hiatus in his work, he concentrated on composing Catholic liturgical music for use by Cantonese-speaking congregations.

Lamalle, Pierre (b *c*1648; d Liège, 28 July 1722). Flemish composer. He entered the cathedral of St Lambert at Liège as a duodenus, and he spent his life there as musician and priest. On 26 September 1664 he received a bursa toledana – an award that enabled choristers whose voices had broken to continue their studies – and on the same day in 1668 the chapter made him another award so that he could continue his studies at the seminary. The following year he offered the chapter a mass he had composed, and its favourable reception is confirmed by the performances of a simphonia by him at High Mass in the cathedral on two consecutive Sundays in January 1671. The political troubles and wars that racked Liège between 1672 and 1715 also affected the cathedral and probably hindered Lamalle's output and success. Nonetheless on 30 April 1672 the maître de chant, Lambert Pietkin, who taught him composition, drew the chapter's attention to his talent as a composer, and he was appointed second succentor. Pietkin's retirement in 1674 and the death seven years later of the first succentor made it possible for Lamalle to become director of the cathedral choir school on 3 September 1681. However, the title of phonascus and the revenue from the post were not accorded him until 1688; in his plea to the chapter to obtain this delayed nomination he pointed out that he had de facto been carrying out the duties of maître de chant for years without being paid to do so and also that he had been composing works for the cathedral in the Italian style.

From 1688, as maître de chant, he set about reorganizing the school, which by 1699 consisted of 30 performers. He encouraged the performance of Italian music, and the italianate tradition that he established persisted throughout the 18th century. From this time onward the canons sent their best young musicians to Rome to perfect their talents. Lamalle himself set them the highest artistic standards. The chapter accepted his resignation on 2 September 1713; in doing so they specifically stated that he should hand over to them all the works that he had composed for the cathedral, a common practice in Liège that unfortunately led to the disappearance of manuscript works of several centuries composed by the maîtres de chant of St Lambert. Lamalle's lost works include the mass and simphonia already referred to and also two other masses. Of a four-part Salve regina only the continuo part survives (B-Lc T205). The same source contains his only surviving complete work, a six-part mass with two obbligato instruments, bassoon and continuo, composed in 1672. The brilliant style of this work, in which the soloists, chorus and instrumentalists partake in a lively dialogue, probably characterized his more mature works too. Free imitation, duets in 3rds, rapid melismas at the ends of phrases and the judicious distribution of the text between the voices are features of a work whose quality explains the high esteem in which the canons of St Lambert held Lamalle.

JOSÉ QUITIN

Laman, Wim (b The Hague, 27 April 1946). Dutch composer. He studied music education and the flute at the Goois Muziklyceum before studying philosophy and music at Leiden University (1970–75). During this period he became known as a composer and worked with student ensembles. He then studied musicology and electronic music at the University of Utrecht's Institute for Sonology. La voce del corno, a radiophonic work, received honourable mentions in the Italia Prize contest and at the Rostrum for Electro-Acoustic Music. Critical of the enclosed world of new music that has existed since Darmstadt, Laman has pleaded for a culture of greater openness towards the public, and for greater effort to be made in the education of contemporary music. While working at VPRO-Radio in Hilversum, he has been able to put some of his ideas into practice.

Agamemnon, his opera of 1997, is the first part of a trilogy based on the Oresteia; the large ensemble in this work creates the most refined musical mosaics possible, giving the audience a soundscape of their own time, but through the glasses of Aeschylus. In order to express the doom over the house of the Atriden, Laman invented an instrument with an enormous string that offers a very low D. Such well-known ensembles as the Residentie-Orkest of the Hague, the Schönberg Ensemble and the Netherlands Wind Ensemble have performed his works.

HUIB RAMAER

Lamare [Lamarre], Jacques-Michel Hurel de (b Paris, 1 May 1772; d Caen, 27 March 1823). French cellist. He entered the Institute of Pages in the Music of the King at the age of seven. He studied the cello first with J.H. Levasseur, and later with J.L. Duport (1787–90). After the Revolution he obtained a position at the Théâtre Feydeau (1794). Parisian audiences acclaimed his virtuosity, and his reputation soon equalled that of Duport. Fétis states that Lamare took up an appointment at the Conservatoire, and although the records there provide no substantiation for this, he was associated closely with the Conservatoire violinists Pierre Baillot and Pierre Rode.

Following Rode's lead, Lamare left Paris in 1801, travelling to London and Berlin and on to Russia, where he was joined by Baillot in 1805. In addition to private performances for the nobility, Lamare participated in the 16 subscription concerts given by Baillot's quartet between 1805 and 1808. When he left Russia and returned to Paris (via Poland, Austria and Belgium), however, he had difficulty in re-establishing himself as a soloist. A Parisian performance in May 1809 was poorly received because 'the violoncello is so little appreciated by the ladies' (AMZ, xi (1809), 605). He subsequently retired from solo playing, but remained in Baillot's quartet until 1815. Marrying a woman of independent wealth, he retired to Caen. Lamare's name remained prominent as Auber's nom de plume for a number of cello compositions; the concertos were used as teaching repertory at the Conservatoire until 1866.

As described in the Berlinische musikalische Zeitung (1806, no.26, pp.102–4), Lamare utilized the orchestral cello hold taught by the Conservatoire, with the instrument placed on his left foot rather than held between his legs. A preference for the upper strings correspondingly became a distinguishing trait, commentators remarking that he even rewrote passages to avoid playing on the cello's lower strings. Nevertheless, Auber's concertos demonstrate that Lamare was on the cutting edge of the new style of performance as exhibited by members of J.B. Viotti's French violin school. Lamare was said to emulate Rode's bowing style, particularly excelling in the execution of dotted-rhythm patterns (piqué) performed at the tip of the bow. Lengthy passages of bravura passagework demonstrate the sophisticated fingering techniques of Duport and include virtuoso phrases of double-stops and solid octaves in the upper registers. Lamare was also described as being a sensitive chamber music player, and having beautiful sound and absolute control of dynamic gradations.

VALERIE WALDEN

Lamarque-Pons, Jaurés (b Salto, 6 May 1917; d Montevideo, 11 June 1982). Uruguayan composer. In Salto he received instruction in the piano and the violin from an early age. He moved to Montevideo (1934), where he continued his piano studies with Guillermo Kolischer. He studied harmony with Tomás Mujica until 1945, harmony and counterpoint with Santórsola (1945–7), and composition and instrumentation with Casal y Chapí (1949–51). He began earning a living as a musician at an early age, serving as piano accompanist at the Salto Choral Society in 1933. In Montevideo he appeared regularly as a pianist for the Ariel Radio Station (1937–9) and at hotels and night clubs.

His works have a nationalist flavour inspired by urban music such as the tango and Afro-Uruguayan candombe rhythms. His opera Marta Gruni (1965), based on a work by the Uruguayan playwright Florencio Sanchez, is considered to be most representative of his style.

LEONARDO MANZINO

La Marre, de (b *c*1630; d after 1666). French dancer, instrumentalist and composer. His first name is unknown. He regularly performed in court ballets from 1653, when he was mentioned as playing the role of 'une assez laide bourgeoise' in Le ballet de la nuit, to 1666, when he danced as a muse in Le ballet des Muses. He was a maître joueur d'instruments. His only known music is a collection of Chansons pour danser et pour boire (Paris, 1650) for one and two voices without continuo. The dedication, to Prévost, one of Louis XIV's dancing-masters, singles out the king's ability as a dancer and recommends him as an example to others. (M.-F. Christout: Le ballet de cour de Louis XIV, 1643–1672, Paris, 1967)

MARGARET M. MCGOWAN

Lamartine, Alphonse(-Marie-Louis Prat) de (b Mâcon, 21 Oct 1790; d Paris, 28 Feb 1869). French writer. He came to fame in 1820 with his Méditations poétiques, a collection of poetry about love and nature, longing, aspiration and imprecise religious sentiments. He published further collections, and at the age of 39 was elected to the Académie Française. By then, however, he was turning to travel writing and history, and had entered politics. Appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs in February 1848, he played a major role in the Second Republic, running for the Presidency in December that year. Defeated by Louis-Napoleon (the future Napoleon III), he devoted the rest of his life to writing, largely to earn a living and pay off creditors. Graziella, a tale based loosely on his early amorous experiences in Italy, first appeared in his not entirely reliable multi-volume Confidences. When published separately in 1858, it tickled Romantic sensibilities and over the next half century formed the basis for ten not very successful operas. Fior d'Aliza (1866), in a similar style, attracted Massé, and Godard fashioned an opera out of Jocelyn. His verse appealed to a number of song writers, especially Gounod and Niedermeyer, whose setting of Le lac was much admired. Liszt's symphonic poem Les préludes (1848) was originally intended as the overture to Les quatre éléments, a cantata on a text by the Marseilles poet Joseph Autran. In the programme note prepared for the first performance at Weimar in 1854, Liszt specifically invites listeners to connect his music with Lamartine. The work offers a valuable insight into the responses awakened in the Romantic period by Lamartine's passionate idealism. Mikhail Fokine choreographed a 'futuristic' ballet after Les préludes for performance by Pavlova's company in Berlin in 1913.

CHRISTOPHER SMITH

La Martoretta [Martoretta, Il Martoretta], Giandominico (b Calabria; fl 1544–66). Italian composer. Before 1554 he had travelled to the Holy Land. On his return he spent some time in Cyprus where he enjoyed the hospitality of the nobleman Piero Singlitico. Einstein wrote that La Martoretta was 'apparently an ecclesiastic'. In 1552 he was referred to as a 'Dottor in musica'. Jan Nasco is known to have supplied the Accademia Filarmonica at Verona with some five-voice madrigals by La Martoretta, but these are now lost. The second of his four-voice madrigal books is entitled 'madrigali cromatici', which signifies that they were written under the mensuration sign C, also known as misura breve. The third book contains a setting of a Greek text, O pothos isdio, which he probably took back to Venice after his stay in Cyprus.

DON HARRÁN

Lamas, José Angel (b Caracas, 2 Aug 1775; d Caracas, 9 Dec 1814). Venezuelan composer. Records exist for his baptism, his burial, the marriage to Maria Josefa Sumosa (1 July 1802) and the birth of three children (1808, 1810, 1812). According to the Caracas Cathedral records he became a soprano in the cathedral choir in 1789–90 and in 1796 was promoted to bassoonist. His appointment and promotion coincide with those of Cayetano Carreño and were probably due to Carreño's influence. The association with Carreño also suggests that Lamas received his musical training at Padre Sojo's school. Lamas, unlike other colonial composers, took no part in the independence war. Nevertheless, during the 19th century several biographical legends grew around him; these have been dispelled by Juan Plaza's researches.

Lamas's works are religious compositions in the style of the Classical motets of the late 18th century. He normally employed two oboes, two horns, strings and a chorus of three or four voices. His choral writing is largely homophonic with little or no imitation. In the three-voice works the bass is invariably provided by the orchestra. Instruments are treated simply but independently, without undue doubling of vocal parts. The wind usually have sustained tones, the lower strings provide the harmonic foundation and rhythmic pulse and the violins have the main melodies or simple figurations. The violin writing is so careful and idiomatic as to suggest that Lamas also played the violin. Choral sections are contrasted with short solos for one or another of the voices. In these passages the instrumental writing colla parte increases considerably. Although Lamas's music is simple, it shows delicate melodic sensibility and a good sense of formal balance. The Popule meus is his best-known work; the Mass in D, Miserere and Ave maris stella in D minor are also notable.

Lamb, Benjamin (b Windsor, 16 May 1674; d Windsor, 17 Aug 1733). English singer, organist and composer. He was the son of Captain Benjamin Lamb, one of the Poor Knights of Windsor, and followed his elder brother William into the choir of St George's Chapel on 24 November 1683. It is not clear whether 'Mr Lambe', one of the clerks at Eton from 1688, was William or Benjamin, but Benjamin was certainly organist there jointly with John Walter from 1705, and served alone from 1709. He was paid for a good deal of music copying at Eton, and some of his manuscripts survive in the college library. From 1716 he also assisted John Goldwin and later John Pigott at St George's Chapel, Windsor. His anthems and service are in a fluent but conventional idiom. Probably most of them were written soon after he acquired his Eton posts. His setting of Saul and the Witch of Endor surprisingly owes more to Ramsey's setting than to Purcell's.

PETER HOLMAN

Lamb, Joseph F(rancis) (b Montclair, NJ, 6 Dec 1877; d Brooklyn, NY, 3 Sept 1960). American ragtime composer. A protégé of Scott Joplin, he remained unidentified for decades because he was assumed to be a black Midwesterner like Joplin and James Scott, with whom he shares honours as one of the three outstanding piano ragtime composers. His first published rag, Sensation, appeared in 1909 with an endorsement from Joplin. From then until 1919 he produced 12 rags on which his high reputation is based. Because Lamb spent his adult life working in the textile trade in Brooklyn, he became romanticized as a recluse amid the commercialism of Tin Pan Alley. After being rediscovered by Blesh and Janis in 1949 he resumed composing rags, occasionally performed his works in public and recorded for the first time in 1959. An anthology of his works was published in 1964.

According to Lamb's own account he consciously composed in two distinct styles: the 'light rags' (e.g. Champagne and Bohemia), making use of tuneful lines and transparent textures and culminating in the commercial idiom of the cakewalk and two-step; and the 'heavy rags' (American Beauty and The Ragtime Nightingale), which abound in complex syncopations, dense textures and virtuoso passages. In these latter works he synthesized the styles of Joplin and Scott with some of his own identifying traits: a diversity of texture (as in the opening period of Excelsior), diatonic and chromatic (rather than pentatonic) melodies and chromatic harmony – including a predilection for the diminished 7th chord with an upper-note appoggiatura. He made considerable use of sequential writing, creating a sense of development very uncommon to ragtime, and concentrated on an eight-bar period, in contrast to Joplin's emphasis on four-bar phrases and Scott's tendency towards two-bar phrases, and an AAB structure. This last trait led to Lamb's most remarkable structural accomplishment: the complete elision of the four-bar caesura, exemplified in the opening strains of American Beauty and Top Liner.

Contrary to legend, Lamb did in fact seek a career in Tin Pan Alley, and published several songs and miscellaneous pieces. He continued to write into the 1920s; some of his pieces in the novelty style influenced his later rags. Lamb refined the piano rag into a very intimate composition, of which the prime example is his posthumously published Alaskan Rag, considered by many to be the supreme lyric and melodic achievement in the piano ragtime literature.

Lambach. Benedictine abbey in Upper Austria. It was founded in 1056 on the site of a fortress protecting the confluence of the rivers Traun and Ager, and was sanctioned by Emperor Heinrich IV in 1061. The first monks came from the monastery of Münsterschwarzach near Würzburg, and in 1089 the church was consecrated.

Situated on the main west-east trade route, the abbey's wealth grew steadily in the Middle Ages, largely based on the salt trade, but its location also made it vulnerable to attack and occupation by conquering forces from the 13th century to Napoleonic times. Abbot Pabo founded an abbey school towards the end of the 12th century by which time a musical scriptorium was already thriving. Illuminated manuscripts in the hands of two monks, Haimo and Gotschalk, are notable, including a fragment of music in neumatic notation for the Dreikönigsspiel frequently performed at the abbey. Other important medieval manuscripts are two examples of the Lambach Ritual (from the beginning and end of the 12th century), a 14th-century collection of songs (both in monody and in parts) copied by Hermann (now in A-Wn, 4696), and the later Mondsee Liederhandschrift (also in Wn, 2856). Performances of sacred drama with some music took place from at least the 14th century.

A choir school was founded in the middle of the 15th century and the first organ was completed in 1471. The period of the Reformation and, later, the Austrian Peasant Wars saw some retrenchment in the activities of the abbey from which it did not begin to recover until the middle of the 17th century. As often in the history of Austrian ecclesiastical foundations, substantial rebuilding in the Baroque style – in this case directed by the imperial architect, Philiberto Luchese – initiated a period of sustained prosperity and influence. Two new organs were built at this time. Three items of church music by Romanus Weichlein (1652–1706) constitute the first extant compositions by a Lambach monk and other active musicians at the abbey included B.L. Ramhaufsky (d 1694), J.B. Hochreiter (*c*1668–1731) and Maximilian Röll (fl 1730); Johann Beer (1655–1700), who was to become Konzertmeister at the court of the Duke of Weissenfels, received his education at Lambach.

Lambach had always had close working connections with the Benedictine abbey at KREMSMÜNSTER, 20 km to the east. Franz Sparry (1715–67), regens chori at Kremsmünster, wrote a number of works for Lambach, including Latin oratorios and sacred compositions. Under the guidance of Amand Schickmayer, who was abbot at Lambach from 1746 to 1794, musical activity reached a high point. Given the close proximity of Salzburg, it is not surprising that music by composers from that city is strongly represented in the library, including works by Adlgasser (1729–77), J.E. Eberlin (1702–62), Michael Haydn, Leopold Mozart and W.A. Mozart. Michael Haydn performed at the abbey on several occasions and two works were specially commissioned from him: a cantata, Ninfe imbelli semplicette, for a visit in January 1765 by Princess Josepha of Bavaria (en route to Vienna to marry the future Joseph II); and the Missa Sancti Amandi for the 30th anniversary in October 1776 of Schickmayer's tenure as abbot. Leopold Mozart and Schickmayer were close acquaintances, and W.A. Mozart visited the abbey on four occasions, to play the organ and clavichord. During a visit in January 1769 Leopold and Wolfgang presented manuscript copies of two symphonies to the abbey. The so-called 'Lambach' (sometimes 'Old Lambach') symphony by Wolfgang is a revised version of the symphony in G (KE45a) first written in the Hague in 1765–6, and the 'New Lambach', which has sometimes been wrongly attributed to Wolfgang, is a symphony in G by Leopold Mozart.

Secular plays with musical numbers also flourished during Schickmayer's time, especially after the theatre was renovated in 1770. The plays of Maurus Lindemayr (1723–83), who was a monk at Lambach for 13 years, are notable for cultivating a proto-romantic enthusiasm for the representation of Austrian folk life; musical numbers by F.J. Aumann (1728–97), F.X. Süssmayr (1766–1803), Johann Wittmann (1757–1847) and others are featured in the plays.

Under Schickmayer's guidance Lambach remained largely unaffected by the monastic reforms undertaken by Joseph II during the 1780s. However, the Napoleonic period saw a decline in the sacred and secular life of the abbey, exacerbated in the first half of the 19th century by indifferent economic management. During the second half of the century church music at Lambach came under the strong influence of the Cecilian movement, a tradition which, together with the establishment of a well-regarded choir, was maintained until 1941 when ecclesiastical life was severely curtailed. It was reactivated after World War II.

DAVID WYN JONES

Lambardi, Camillo (b Naples, *c*1560; d Naples, Nov 1634). Italian organist and composer. He spent nearly all his musical career at SS Annunziata in Naples. He served there from 1569 as a high treble and was taught by Nola, the maestro di cappella; he had become a tenor by February 1579. After having deputized for Nola on several occasions in 1588 and 1591, he took up the appointment of maestro di cappella on 5 May 1592, working under the condition that he perform only works by Stella and Macque, the organists of SS Annunziata. This condition was relaxed, however, on 24 May 1595. He supplemented his income by providing music for such occasions as the funerals of members of the Monte della Misericordia in 1612 and 1630. When he retired in 1631 his monthly wage was 15 ducats.

Lambardi's sacred works were all dedicated to the governors of SS Annunziata. His responsories are for double chorus, but, unlike Gesualdo's, they have through-composed responds. The two-part motets of 1613, mainly for soprano and bass, include three pieces that may be arrangements of motets from Hippolito Tartaglino's book of 1574. The three-part motets of 1628, many with high alto parts, use a great deal of repetition in the last half of each work. His first book of madrigals for four voices has none of the strong dissonances and contrasts characteristic of the seconda pratica and used in some madrigals of the second book.

Camillo Lambardi's sons were FRANCESCO LAMBARDI, Andrea Lambardi (b Naples, 1590–?95; d Naples, 1629), who in 1604 was a soprano at SS Annunziata and later a tenor at the royal chapel, and Giacinto Lambardi (b Naples, 1585–?90; d Naples, *c*1650), who composed the music (now lost) for G.B. Basile's mascherata Monte Parnaso of 1630. Giacinto aided Francesco as organist of the royal chapel from 1636 and succeeded him in that post in 1642. Gennaro Lambardi, possibly another son of Camillo, was an alto at SS Annunziata in 1604 and in 1614 an alto-tenor in the royal chapel. Filippo Lambardi, whose relationship with the rest of the family is unknown, received six ducats on 29 January 1627 for organizing the music for the funeral of a member of the Accademia degli Annoverati in Naples.

Lambardi, Francesco (b Naples, *c*1587; d Naples, 25 July 1642). Italian composer, son of CAMILLO LAMBARDI. After serving as a treble in 1599 and an alto in 1600 at SS Annunziata, he served the royal chapel as a tenor in 1607 and, from 1615 until his death, as organist. He was maestro di cappella of the Conservatorio di S Maria della Pietà dei Turchini from 1626 to 1630, and of S Maria la Nova in 1628. He gave private music lessons to Maria Ruffo, Princess of Scilla, in 1612, provided entertainment music at Posillipo in 1614, and opened a singing school in 1623. His arias are among the earliest Neapolitan pieces to specify the use of a basso continuo. One two-part piece Vita mia di te privo from the 1607 publication, although titled 'madrigal', is stylistically no different from the arias for two voices that make up the rest of the publication, and is partly modelled on Nenna's madrigal for five voices to the same text from his first 1603 publication. Only the 1614 arias use gorgia and sprezzatura effects. The villanellas in the 1614 and 1616 books are mostly in two sections and make much use of smooth triple metre enlivened by syncopation.

Lambardi [Lambardo], Girolamo (b Venice; fl 1586–1623). Italian composer. On the title-pages of his publications he described himself as a canon regular of Santo Spirito, Venice. He probably spent most of his life in Venice. Although he appears not to have held a specific musical post, the sheer size of his production could well be taken as indicative of a certain continuity in musical activity at Santo Spirito. Giovanni Croce's Magnificat omnium tonorum of 1605, which is dedicated to Lambardi, describes him as a pupil of Zarlino. Eitner and Gaspari maintained that he studied under Palestrina. His works belong to the tradition of 16th-century sacred polyphony, even the later ones that include continuo. Largely functional in character, they include most of the chief types of liturgical polyphony of the period. The music is not difficult: voice ranges are somewhat restricted and the counterpoint is generally simple. Lambardi's reputation was probably limited to Venetian musical circles and his monastic order. He was at any rate well respected in Venice, for Monteverdi bought some of his music, together with works by Lassus, Palestrina and Soriano, for performance on ferial days at S Marco.

Lambe (*fl c*1400). English composer. His name is attached to a Sanctus in the Old Hall Manuscript (ed. in CMM, xlvi, 1969–73; no.97), a descant setting in score with Sarum Sanctus no.2 in the middle voice. The manuscript has been trimmed, leaving open the possibility that his name may have been longer. He might, for instance, be the Lambertus to whom a square in I-Rvat Reg.lat.1146 is ascribed. It has also been suggested that he may have been the LAMPENS of the lost Strasbourg Manuscript (F-Sm 222; T. Dart, RBM, viii, 1954, pp.122–4).

MARGARET BENT

Lambe, Walter (b ?1450–51; d after Michaelmas 1504). English composer. He may be identifiable with the Walter Lambe, born in Salisbury and aged 15 on 15 August 1466, who was elected scholar of Eton College on 8 July 1467. In 1476–7 he was a clerk in the chapel of the collegiate church of the Holy Trinity at Arundel. On 5 January 1479 he was admitted clerk of the choir of St George's Chapel, Windsor, and at Michaelmas in that year he and William Edmunds were appointed joint informatores, replacing Thomas Gossyp, who with several other members of the chapel had died of plague during the summer. Lambe's antiphon Stella caeli, the text of which requests divine relief from plague, was perhaps written at this time. Lambe became sole informator at Christmas 1479 and retained the post until he left St George's in 1484–5. He seems then to have returned to Arundel, where he is again listed as a clerk in the next surviving set of accounts for 1490–91. On 1 July 1492 he resumed his clerkship at Windsor but was not reappointed informator; he was still there in 1503–4. The Edward Lambe who was a chorister at Arundel in 1490–91, and the 'Walter Lambe of Arundel' who entered Winchester College as a scholar at the age of ten in 1500, are likely to have been sons of the composer.

Lambe was evidently a highly regarded composer. Only John Browne contributed more compositions to the Eton Choirbook, and of the Eton Choirbook composers contemporary with Lambe only William Cornysh, Richard Davy and Robert Fayrfax are represented in as many surviving sources. He was an extremely accomplished and resourceful exponent of the florid choral style which came to maturity during his lifetime and which English composers continued to cultivate until the Reformation. His motets in five and six parts encompass a total of 21, 22 or 23 notes and contrast fully scored sections with more profusely decorated passages for a reduced number of voices. Stylistic differentiation is not so marked in the four-voice works, which contain a larger proportion of music in full scoring and use an overall compass of 14 or 15 notes. Lambe was a fastidious craftsman, particularly in his often subtle manipulation of motifs and imitative ideas in order to bind reduced-voice sections together. He also achieved a strong sense of drive in the fully scored sections, and had a flair for well-timed cadences (the ending of Nesciens mater is an excellent example).

Lambe's cantus firmus technique is an interesting blend of current and retrospective practice. O Maria plena gratia is perhaps most observant of contemporary English convention in using as its cantus firmus a plainchant melody unconnected with the motet text, and in laying this out, mainly in long note values, in the tenor part of the fully scored sections. The fragmentary six-part O regina caelestis gloriae adventurously extends this technique by incorporating a double cantus firmus of two simultaneously stated plainchants, a procedure which seems to have no English precedent, although two other Eton Choirbook composers may have emulated Lambe in works which are now fragmentary: Richard Davy in his six-part Gaude flore virginali and Robert Wylkynson in his six-part Magnificat. It seems unlikely that Lambe could have known any of the very few comparable continental works such as the Missa 'Sub tuum praesidium' by Obrecht or the Missa 'Ecce ancilla'/'Ne timeas' by Johannes Regis (d 1485). In Ascendit Christus, Nesciens mater and Salve regina, Lambe maintained an earlier 15th-century English tradition by using as his cantus firmus the plainchants proper to the motet text. His treatment of these cantus firmi, combining conventional tenor layout with migration and paraphrase in both fully scored and reduced-voice sections, emphasizes his important transitional role in the history of later 15th-century English music.

Lambeg drum. A large double-headed drum associated with the Ulster Orange Order, measuring approximately 90 cm in diameter, 75 cm in depth and weighing about 20 kg, traditionally used for accompanying fife tunes in Orange processions. Among the many myths about its origin is one that it was introduced by Duke Schomberg's troops at the time of the Battle of the Boyne (1690). However, its name probably derives from the first use of such a drum at a demonstration about 1894 in the village of Lambeg, near Belfast. The 'Lambeg', as it is colloquially known, is beaten with bamboo canes: earlier drums were smaller and beaten with boxwood drumsticks.

Although the fife-and-drum bands, playing reel, jig or hornpipe tunes in march time, have largely been replaced by brass bands in the towns, the drum and its playing art have been preserved, mainly as a sport or hobby, and the Lambeg still accompanies certain processions in country districts and in Ballymena. Lambeg drumming contests are held regularly during the summer in which solo drummers display the good tone or 'ring' of their drums and their skill in maintaining and ornamenting traditional rhythms. Each district of Ulster has its own march-rhythm dialects based on traditional dance rhythms. Some are based on popular songs. Ex.1 illustrates the relationship between a Lambeg rhythm and its fife tune.

Ex.1 Boyne Water, transcr. F. Scullion

Two families, Johnson and Hewitt, have traditionally been responsible for the manufacture and maintenance of Lambeg drums, though the hard-wearing oak shells need little attention; many drummers have learnt to recover their own shells with the traditional goatskin. Before World War II occasional 'stick-ins' were held in which champion drummers, often representing rival families, faced each other in a test of endurance and strength, playing for up to nine hours at a time as the one attempted to outlast the other or to confuse his rhythm.

Lambelet, Georgios (b Corfu, 24 Dec 1875; d Athens, 31 Oct 1945). Greek composer and critic. Introduced to the piano by his mother and to theory and harmony by his father, he enrolled in the faculty of law at Athens University before studying at the S Pietro a Majella Conservatory, Naples (1895–1901). On his return to Greece, long before Kalomiris's 1908 manifesto of the national school, Lambelet published his essay 'National Music', in which he called for composers to draw inspiration from their folk traditions; this nationalist stance was also adopted by his periodical Kritiki, first issued in 1903. For a year he was director of the Piraeus League conservatory, and for several years of the Piraeus League Conservatory. He also taught music at the Varvakeion Lyceum, Athens, and was editor of the monthly periodical Moussika hronika (1928–9).

Much of Lambelet's music is lost, but what has survived displays flawless technique and harmonic taste, qualities especially evident in his sensitive approach to the harmonization of Greek folksongs in the collection Elleniki dhimodhis moussiki (1930). His tone-poem I yorti ('The Village Fair') is characterized by certainty of form and colourful orchestration, while his songs, generally based on folksong modes, adhere sensitively to the inflections of Greek language. Often exploiting dramatic changes of tempo and rhythm (I anthostefanoti), they make the most of a harmonically transparent yet emotionally suggestive piano writing, thus representing an intermediate link from the songs of Samaras to those of Riadis and the art of Constantinidis. Lambelet's intellectual integrity as a critic has set an example: risking marginalization, he was for decades almost the only opposition to the establishment of Nazos at the Athens Conservatory and, later, Kalomiris.

Lambelet's brother Napoleon (1864–1932) was active from the mid-1890s as a musical director in the London theatre, working under André Charlot among others. As well as composing incidental music, one-act operettas for music halls and music for pantomime, he provided the replacement score for Seymour Hicks's The Yashmak (1897). Further details of his career are given in GänzlEMT.

GEORGE LEOTSAKOS

Lambert, (Leonard) Constant (b London, 23 Aug 1905; d London, 21 Aug 1951). English composer, conductor and writer on music. A sickly child, he suffered from ill-health throughout his life. His family, while never particularly stable (his father, the painter George Washington Thomas Lambert, left for Australia in 1920 and never saw him again), nevertheless instilled in him an appreciation for the visual arts and literature that brought a distinctive character to his career as a music critic and writer. After winning a scholarship to the RCM, he studied composition with Ralph Vaughan Williams, R.O. Morris and George Dyson, the piano with Herbert Fryer and conducting with Malcolm Sargent.

As a young man, Lambert developed interests in French and Russian music, and the works of Stravinsky and Liszt. The influences of pointillism, neo-classicism and Romanticism are apparent in the orchestral rhapsody Green Fire (?1923), inspired by Russian themes; Prize-Fight (1923–4), a 'Realistic Ballet in One-Act' strongly redolent of Satie and Les Six; and Mr Bear Squash-You-All-Flat (1923–4), a one-act ballet based on a Russian children's tale. Two London pavilion shows, Dover Street to Dixie (1923) and The Blackbirds (1926), introduced him to the world of jazz, an influence that surfaced in compositions such as Elegiac Blues (1927).

Lambert, who enjoyed bohemian artistic circles and salon culture, was a regular visitor at Philip Heseltine's cottage at Eynsford. He was also friendly with the Waltons and Sitwells, his neighbours in Chelsea, acquaintances that led to his role as co-reciter with Edith Sitwell in Walton's Façade at the Chenil Galleries in April 1926. The painters Charles Ricketts and C.H. Shannon and the collector Edmund Davis introduced Lambert to Diaghilev who commissioned Romeo and Juliet for the Ballets Russes. Although Lambert threatened to withdraw his score after Diaghilev made various changes to the choreography and rejected Christopher Wood's set designs in favour of those by surrealists Max Ernst and Joan Miró, he was forcibly prevented from doing so. After a cool reception at its first performance in Monte Carlo (4 May 1926), the ballet was performed in Paris, sparking a riot largely orchestrated by the antagonistic surrealists Louis Aragon and André Breton. The first London production, however, was more successful. The neo-Baroque style of the work, recalling the music of Domenico Scarlatti, suggests the influence of Stravinsky's Pulcinella, a model used subsequently in Pomona (1926), written for Bronislava Nizhinska's company in Buenos Aires.

During the second half of the 1920s, Lambert worked sporadically. Though he was short of money, these years proved to be his most fertile in terms of composition. Infatuated by the film actress Anna May Wong, he immersed himself in things Chinese, composing Eight Poems of Li-Po (1926–9), fragile miniatures of impressive economy and poignancy. Music for Orchestra (1927), an introduction and allegro design, received several performances, despite its more severe contrapuntal invention. The Rio Grande (1927), a work displaying his fascination with the exotic, was an immediate success. Using elements of cantata, dance rhapsody, concerto and fantasy, he brought both seduction and melancholy to Sacheverell Sitwell's atmospheric poem. To his regret, however, the popularity of the work established a set of stylistic expectations that impeded the reception of later works such as the Piano Sonata (1928–9) and the Concerto for Piano and Nine Players (1930–31). A memorial to Heseltine, the Concerto is imbued with a free interpretation of Classical forms, blurred on the one hand by elements of jazz improvisation and metrical complexity, and on the other by an austere harmonic language on the edge of tonality.

The last 20 years of Lambert's life, largely owing to his appointment as conductor of the Carmargo Society in 1930 and musical director of the Vic-Wells company in 1931, saw the composition of far fewer original works. His fascination for 16th- and 17th-century literature and music, however, did find expression in Summer's Last

Constant Lambert

Will and Testament (1932–5). Written in the form of a masque to words from Thomas Nashe's Pleasant Comedy (1593), the work was dedicated to Florence Chuter, whom he married in 1931. His most substantial undertaking, Summer's Last Will and Testament is an urban pastoral in which early forms (madrigal con ritornelli, coranto, branle and sarabande) are the vehicles for expressing the polarized emotions of Bacchian exuberance and autumnal sadness.

As Lambert grew older, melancholy contemplation figured more conspicuously in his works, particularly those composed during the war, such as Dirge from Cymbeline (1940), dedicated to his friend Patrick Hadley, and Aubade héroïque (1942). The ballet Tiresias (1950–51), with its sinewy neo-classical style, lies between the worlds of Stravinsky and Roussel. Its licentious plot, involving sex-changes, copulating snakes and erotic suggestion, had to be toned down for its gala performance (9 July 1951) in the presence of Queen Elizabeth (now the Queen Mother). OUP later refused to publish the work and, despite a number of performances of a shortened version by Lutyens, it quickly fell into obscurity. In 1995, after 40 years of neglect, the shorter version was broadcast by the BBC.

From 1930 onwards Lambert began to devote more time to music criticism, writing for the Nation, the Athenaeum, the Sunday Referee, Figaro, the Saturday Review, the Daily Chronicle and the Daily Telegraph. He also wrote for the Radio Times, The Listener and BBC's Music Magazine (1944). The first postwar production of Purcell's The Fairy Queen (1946) used his edition, and gave rise to a collaborative publication with both Edward Dent and Michael Ayrton (London, 1948). A critic of independent and unconventional views, Lambert had violent likes and dislikes and used his not inconsiderable powers of wit and satire towards both generous and destructive ends. His one extended work of criticism, Music, Ho! (London, 1934), reflects his concern in relating modern music to the other arts and 'the social and mechanical background of modern life'. An eminently readable volume, largely devoid of technical description, he uses his wide knowledge of painting, sculpture, literature and the cinema to draw parallels between artistic, cinematic, literary and musical trends in the early 20th century. The book's subtitle, A Study of Music in Decline, reflects his inherent pessimism about the future. This is not only expressed in his incisive and largely negative examinations of neo-classicism, nationalism and revolution, but also in his assessment of musical reception: composers were destined, he believed, to become more sophisticated, like Berg, or, like Weill, they would turn 'their sophistication to popular account'. Although he admired both composers, Lambert reserved his greatest approbation for Sibelius, van Dieren and Busoni.

Though Lambert is remembered principally for his work as conductor of the Royal Ballet, he was also active as a conductor for ISCM, as an associate conductor of the Proms (1945–6), as a guest conductor of the Hallé and Scottish orchestras (after 1947), and, from time to time, as an opera conductor at Sadler's Wells (1931) and Covent Garden (1937, 1939, 1947). He did much to promote the work of Weill, Satie, Walton and Berners.

Lambert, Herbert. English clavichord maker. He was active in Bath; his instruments served as models for those built by THOMAS GOFF.

Lambert, Johann Heinrich (b Mulhouse, ?26 Aug 1728; d Berlin, 25 Sept 1777). German scientist. From 1748 to 1758 he was tutor to the children of a Swiss noble family; in 1765 he managed to obtain a post at the Akademie der Wissenschaften in Berlin. He was one of those universal scientists characteristic of the 17th and 18th centuries, and was a figure of particular importance in several subjects mainly connected with physics and mathematics. He determined very precisely the frequencies of the first eight overtones of a bar in its clamped-free modes, correcting and extending Euler's results; the results of Rayleigh and others, a century or more later, were less conclusive. Lambert projected a musical instrument, the 'musique solitaire', whereby a person might enjoy music through his teeth without awakening sleepers.

MURRAY CAMPBELL

Lambert, John (Arthur Neill) (b Maidenhead, 15 July 1926; d Brighton, 7 March 1995). English composer. After studies at the RAM and the RCM (1943–50) and, privately, with Boulanger in Paris, Lambert was at different times director of music at the Old Vic Theatre (1958–62), organist of St Vedast-alias-Foster in the City of London (1949–77), and professor of composition at the RCM (1963–90), where he set up, in the face of a notoriously conservative establishment, an Experimental Music Group. Widely considered as one of the most influential of British composition teachers, his many eminent pupils include Julian Anderson, Oliver Knussen, Mark-Anthony Turnage and Simon Bainbridge, all of whom pay lavish tribute to his influence and his insistence on a refined and thorough approach to creativity. Partly because of this insistence and because of his commitment to teaching, his own music is limited in quantity, its wider dissemination prevented both by his inability to cement long-lasting relationships with publishers and by the related difficulty of securing repeated performances. But its high quality, its economy of means, its clarity and its intellectual integrity are widely recognized. His influences include Dutilleux, Boulez and Ligeti. Like those composers, he was intrigued by the play of textures, by block contrasts, and above all perhaps by processes of quasi-ritualistic transformation. Often that transformation will take the form of a disintegration which builds to something new. In Veni Creator the process is slightly different, with each instrument – organ and voice – achieving a rapport with the other by gradually 'crossing over' into the other's territory. The process in Formations and Transformations, performed at the Promenade Concerts in 1972, is a matter of revealing one layer and concealing it with another. Orpheus Cycle I (1969–70) is an early experiment with multimedia in which an 8 mm film depicts symbols of each of the elements, and uses transformations of colour, while Orpheus Cycle II is a literal musical depiction of the confrontation and subsequent interaction of Orpheus (oboe) and Charon (harpsichord). Elements of improvisation feature in a number of works, among them Tread Softly for four guitars, and Lambert's fascination with spatial aspects of music is evinced in the swirling sounds presented by three antiphonal groups in ... but then face to face, for ten guitars doubling organ, piano, voice and percussion. But arguably his finest achievements are the two string quartets, the incomplete five-work cycle Sea-Change, Seasons, commissioned for the RCM centenary in 1982, and the sinister chamber opera Family Affairs.

STEPHEN PETTITT

Lambert, Michel (b Champigny-sur-Veudes, *c*1610; d Paris, 27 June 1696). French composer, singer and singing teacher. Educated as a choirboy in the chapel of Gaston d'Orléans, the elder brother of Louis XIII, Lambert began making his name as a singer in Paris in the 1640s. He benefited from the support of several patrons, including Cardinal Richelieu, the bishop of Lisieux, Fouquet, Gaston d'Orléans and his daughter Mlle de Montpensier, known as 'la Grande Mademoiselle'. His name is also associated with the précieux circles of Paris at the time, first that of Mme de Rambouillet, and after the 1650s the circle of Mlle de Scudéry. In 1641 he married Gabrielle Dupuy, a singer; they had a daughter, Madeleine, who later married Jean-Baptiste Lully. From then on Lambert's career was frequently linked to that of his sister-in-law, Hilaire Dupuy, a famous singer who performed in musical entertainments at court, in sacred music (she sang in the offices of Tenebrae) and in court ballets. Documentary records show that Lambert first performed as a dancer in 1651 in the ballets produced at the court of the young king Louis XIV. After 1656 his reputation as a composer of airs was consolidated by their regular appearance in the collections of Airs de differents autheurs published by Christophe Ballard. In 1660 he published the first book of airs with basso continuo to be engraved in France. Lambert was appointed maître de la musique de la chambre du roi in May 1661, a position that he held until his death. His son-in-law Jean-Baptiste Lully was appointed surintendant de la musique de la chambre du roi and from this time their professional and family lives were closely connected: Lambert wrote several récits and dialogues for Lully's ballets of the 1660s. Among the duties of Lambert's post were the education of pages in the royal chapel and the training of choristers in the Chambre du Roi.

Lambert had been recognized since 1636 as an important singer and singing teacher. In the dedication of his first book of airs to Pierre de Nyert in 1660, he praised the 'beautiful manner of singing' introduced by Nyert after his sojourn in Italy and said that he was indebted to him for 'all the best I know'. His singing and teaching were widely, even extravagantly, praised. The singer Anne de la Barre wrote to Constantijn Huygens that he was 'the best singing teacher in Paris' (letter of 31 July 1648); Perrin called him the 'Amphion of our days'; according to Le Cerf de la Viéville he was 'the best master to have appeared in centuries'; and Titon du Tillet described the 'charming concerts' in his country home at Puteau-sur-Seine in which he accompanied himself on the theorbo.

Ex.2 Mes yeux, que vos plaisirs (Airs, 1689)

His popularity at court is a matter of record: the 'Compte de la maison du Roi' for July 1688 shows that 1200 livres were given to him as soloist for the king. Some idea of his method may be obtained from a reading of the Remarques curieuses sur l'art de bien chanter (1668; Eng. trans., 1968) of Bacilly, who directed his readers to several airs by Lambert for illustrations.

Although most of Lambert's collections of airs are lost (the Mercure galant numbered them at 20 in 1668), his position as the most important and prolific French composer of airs sérieux in the second half of the 17th century can be confirmed by a study of the more than 330 airs by him that remain in printed and manuscript sources. Lambert was careful in his choice of texts, using the works of some 50 poets, including Bouchardeau, the Comtesse de La Suze, Pierre Perrin, La Fontaine, Scarron, Guillaume and François Colletet. The commonest form in the airs is a short binary structure followed by a double familiar from the air de cour. There are also examples of rounded binary airs (e.g. Mes yeux, que vos plaisirs) and, from the 1670s onwards, airs en rondeau (Ah! qui voudra desormais s'engager); some airs border on recitative (the tragic lament Ombre de mon amant); others borrow the rhythmic organization of dances such as sarabands (D'un feu secret) or are built over chaconne basses (Ma bergère); and some are organized as dialogues (Loin de vos yeux). In general Lambert's airs are models of elegance and grace in which careful attention is paid to correct declamation (for which he was praised by d'Ambruys and Jean Rousseau). In most of his doubles he did not allow melismatic writing to destroy the shape of the original melodies (ex.1) and rarely wrote the sort of purely abstract melodic patterns that mar some of the airs even of Guédron. Ex.2 illustrates his control of variation techniques: a three-part instrumental statement is followed by solo and ensemble settings, and all are based on the same melodic and harmonic materials.

Through his dialogues and some of his more dramatic récits Lambert influenced French opera composers. Ménestrier (Des représentations en musique anciennes et modernes, Paris, 1681) quoted the text of a dialogue by him between Silvie and Tircis to show how such 'petites chansons' had served as models for what he called 'musique d'action et de Théâtre'.

Lambert, Pierre-Jean (d ?Paris, ? 20 Oct 1752). French composer and harpsichordist. He is known only through two works, Pièces de clavecin and a cantatille, L'aurore (both in F-Pn), as well as a privilege dated 1 April 1749. The harpsichord pieces are dedicated to the Comtesse de Montgommery (Marie-Anne-Rose, Marquise de Thiboutot), a pupil. Their indebtedness to earlier music is naively apparent – a hunting divertissement is modelled on Dandrieu, a variation of Les sauterelles on Rameau's Les niais de Sologne. They are characterized by their use of brilliant figuration, and are the last pieces to use the appoggiatura and mordent symbols of d'Anglebert and Rameau. The cantatille is later than the harpsichord pieces (its title includes an advertisement for them); it is for voice, one obbligato line marked 'violons & flûtes' and basso continuo, and divided into four movements. Lambertini. Portuguese firm of piano makers. Luigi Gioacchino Lambertini (b Bologna, 17 March 1790; d Lisbon, 13 Nov 1864) was a fellow student of Rossini at the Liceo Filarmonico (now Conservatorio Statale di Musica G.B. Martini), Bologna. He emigrated to Lisbon for political reasons in 1836, and established a piano-making business with the help of four of the best workers from his Italian workshop, receiving a prize for his instruments in 1838. In 1860, under the direction of his sons Evaristo (b ?Bologna, 10 June 1827; d Lisbon, 7 Dec 1900) and Ermete Lambertini (d Lisbon, 11 Dec 1887), the firm became Lambertini Filhos & Ca., selling and publishing music as well as making pianos. The firm later became Lambertini & Irmão. Evaristo's son, Michel'Angelo Lambertini (b Oporto, 14 April 1852; d Lisbon, 20 Dec 1920), was a fine pianist and founded the Grande Orchestra Portuguesa in 1906. The firm closed in 1922.

Lambertini, Giovan Tomaso (b Bologna; fl 1545–80; d ?Rome). Italian composer and singer. He was appointed mansionario (beneficed chaplain) at S Petronio, Bologna, in November 1545. The archives record a payment to him in December 1546 for copying a book of music by the maestro del canto, Michele Cimatore. In 1548 he entered the choir of the basilica and was registered as singer and scribe. Following a disagreement with the other mansionarii he was expelled from his benefice in March 1573. Although he was reinstated two months later by Cardinal Paleotti, he was in Rome in September of the same year: apparently Cardinal Otto von Truchsess von Waldburg, to whom he had dedicated his Septem psalmi poenitentiales (1569), invited him to serve him there. He was a tenor in the Cappella Giulia between 1578 and 1580. The statement by Eitner that he was a singer at S Petronio until 1628 is incorrect, as is the one by Fétis that he was vicemaestro di cappella at S Lorenzo, Venice, in 1560.

Lambertini's compositions, all for four voices, display a rich harmonic language that exploits the interplay of major and minor sonorities. His part-writing is non-imitative, and his vocal lines tend to lack distinct melodic shape. However, since he wrote excellent counterpoint and maintained a happy balance between linear and chordal passages, the text declamation is neither monotonous nor artlessly obvious.

Lambertini, Marta (b San Isidro, 12 Nov 1937). Argentine composer. She studied with Luis Gianneo, Caamaño and Gandini at the Catholic University of Argentina (graduation 1972); she also studied electro-acoustic composition at the Centro de Investigaciones en Comunicación Masiva, Arte y Tecnología (CICMAT), Buenos Aires. She is a member of the Academy of Sciences and Arts of San Isidro. Since 1973 she has taught composition and orchestration at the faculty of arts and musical sciences of the Catholic University of Argentina, and since 1994 she has been the faculty dean. She has received many prizes and takes part in national and international festivals and competitions, both as a composer and as a member of the jury.

In Lambertini's prolific output there are very few works that can be considered what is traditionally called 'pure music'. She often has recourse to literary inspiration, and from her early works onwards there are two major characteristics: the theme of the cosmos, for example in Quasares(1971), Galileo descubre las cuatro lunas de Júpiter (1985), Ultima filmación de los anillos de Saturno (1991) and Rigel (1980); and her humour, which can be seen in La question pataphysique (1983), The Pool of Tears (1987), O, Ewigkeit . . . ! I and II, and Alice in Wonderland (1989). In this last work, full of cross-references, she uses different languages (English, Italian and Spanish), and tries out various musical genres to represent the multiplicity of readings offered by Lewis Carroll's original text. While in her works produced from 1970 to 1980 she used references to other musical works as 'quotations' (Serenata, Gymel, Alice in Wonderland etc.) or transcriptions of complete musical pieces (for example the 'Madrigal de Marenzio' from Alice in Wonderland) to create settings for the characters to move about in her later works, and especially from 1990 onwards, she has investigated the various possibilities offered by the 'objet trouvé', and has then gone on (in works such as Reunión, La casa inundada and La ribera) to 'fracture' all the elements derived from this, rupturing its original meaning in order to convert it into a new musical entity with new and different characteristics. The selection of these elements is not a matter of whim, since it is always intimately related to the 'story' or the landscape that is being represented musically. The results of these transformations, on the level of expression, are a close solidarity with these musical objects: when they return to their original form, they no longer appear as 'quotations', but are completely absorbed by the context. One can say that by means of these procedures Lambertini has inverted the use of the quotation, resulting in the suppression of the quotation as such.

RAQUEL C. DE ARIAS

Lambertus, Magister [Pseudo-Aristoteles] (*fl c*1270). Music theorist. His Tractatus de musica made an important contribution to the theory of measured music between Johannes de Garlandia and Franco of Cologne. All that is known of his life or nationality is that he evidently spent time in Parisian musical circles. Apart from the treatise itself, the only information about him derives from the comments of three other theorists: the St Emmeram or Sowa anonymus, Johannes de Grocheio and Jacobus of Liège. The St Emmeram anonymus, writing in 1279, mentioned Lambertus by name and several times made strenuous objections to his notational ideas. At the end of the 13th century Grocheio mentioned him as an advocate of a system of nine rhythmic modes rather than the six modes of Johannes de Garlandia or the five of Franco of Cologne. Jacobus of Liège in the 14th century cited him three times along with Franco as a respected and eminent authority, but Jacobus referred to him by the name Aristotle rather than Lambertus – an error that probably arose as a result of one anonymous copy of Lambertus's treatise following a work ascribed to Aristotle. The treatise also circulated under the name of Bede, among whose complete works (Basle, 1563) it was printed as De musica quadrata seu mensurata (ed. in PL, xc, 919–38); as such it was cited by Francisco de Salinas (1577).

Yudkin (1991) has suggested that Lambertus should be identified with the man of that name who was a magister of the University of Paris and dean of St Vincent, Soignies; his will, dated 8 April 1270, names as his executor Robert of Sorbon, canon of Paris and founder of the Collège de Sorbonne. Pinegar has alternatively proposed an identification with Labertus of Auxerre, a Dominican scholar buried at the covent of St Jacques in Paris, but this seems less likely since the tonary included with Lambertus's treatise shows no Dominican characteristics.

Lambertus's Tractatus de musica (ed. in CoussemakerS, i, 251–81; ed. in CSM, forthcoming) dates from the third quarter of the 13th century, most probably from the decade 1265–75. As it survives today, the first two-thirds of the treatise deals with the traditional topics of speculative music and of practical rudiments needed by performers; this portion may well be a compilatio not directly connected to Lambertus. After opening with statements on the definitions, etymology and invention of music, there is a section dealing with the notes of the gamut, the hexachord system, the staff, B♭ and B♮ and mutation. The treatise allows 12 musical intervals from the unison to the octave, deliberately excluding the tritone. Like Johannes de Garlandia, it subdivides consonant and dissonant intervals into perfect, medial and imperfect, although this formulation differs in its details. This section concludes with an explanation of the ecclesiastical modes and a fairly extensive tonary with musical examples.

The more important last portion of the treatise – the part specifically associated with Lambertus by later theorists – discusses measured music and its notation. Here Lambertus shows himself to be the most important polyphonic theorist between the modal theory associated with Johannes de Garlandia and the mensural theory of Franco of Cologne. His doctrine, though heavily indebted to Garlandian theory, nonetheless reveals a shift in emphasis that prepared the way for the fully mensural system set out by Franco in about 1280. Lambertus's work indicates that by about 1270 the old modal rhythms and melismatic successions of ligatures were necessarily giving way to mensural techniques in the syllabically texted motet.

After the classification of the categories of musica mensurabilis as discant, 'hokettus' and organum, there is an extensive discussion of discant, followed by several paragraphs on hocket (organum is mentioned only in passing). Lambertus did not begin with a discussion of mode and ligature patterns but with an exposition of single note forms: the perfect long, the imperfect long, the brevis recta and brevis altera, the semibrevis major and minor, and later, the duplex long. The most significant innovation proved to be his insistence on the priority of the perfect long of three tempora as the fount and origin of all other note values. Here he directly contradicted earlier modal theory and Johannes de Garlandia, who regarded the long of two tempora as the 'correct' long and the basis of the rhythmic system; Lambertus's perfect long was in Garlandian teaching the long 'beyond measure'. Lambertus dwelt at length on the concept of perfection and imperfection, explaining how perfections are formed by various combinations of longs and breves and quoting musical examples from the motet repertory. He also specified that the brevis recta divides into three equal or two unequal semibreves.

Lambertus next considered ligatures of two to five notes and their rhythmic interpretations. For him the shape of a ligature, not its position in an additive modal series, was the most significant factor as regards its rhythm; the propriety of a ligature is determined purely by the presence or absence of a descending stroke on the left side. Lambertus was also precise about the length of the symbols for rests of different durations.

His last major topic, presented in poetic form, is a consideration of the RHYTHMIC MODES, of which he is unique in listing nine. In accordance with his concept of the primacy of the perfect long, his 1st mode is Johannes de Garlandia's 5th, and he stated that all other modes can be resolved or reduced to this mode. His 2nd to 5th modes are equivalent to Garlandia's 1st to 4th modes and his 7th is Garlandia's 6th. The 6th, 8th and 9th modes are Lambertus's additions; all three feature semibreves, and in the motets quoted as musical examples, each semibreve has its own syllable of text. Thus his added modes reflect the new divisive rhythms and more rapid declamation of text fashionable in the motet during the last third of the 13th century.

The dozen or more motets which Lambertus cited are found mostly in the Montpellier and Bamberg manuscripts (F-MO H 196 and D-BAs Ed.IV.6), although several appear also in the La Clayette and Las Huelgas manuscripts (F-Pn fr.13521 and E-BUlh), and other sources, including the musical appendix in the 13th-century manuscript that is the most important source of the Tractatus itself (F-Pn lat.11266). Lambertus's notational ideas find their best representation in the motets of this short collection appended to his treatise, but his doctrine is also partly reflected in the notation of the Bamberg manuscript. By providing Franco of Cologne with the fruitful concepts of perfection, the perfect long and the imperfect long, Lambertus helped to set the stage for the next several centuries of the mensural system.

Lambeth Choirbook (GB-Llp 1). See SOURCES, MS, §IX, 19.

Lambranzi, Gregorio (fl early 18th century). Italian dancer and choreographer. He wrote one of the most interesting 18th-century books on dance: Neue und curieuse theatrialische Tantz-Schul (Nuremberg, 1716/R with commentary by K. Petermann and Eng. trans.). The title-page (see illustration) and preface indicate that Lambranzi was born in or around Venice, and that as a dancer he toured Italy, Germany and France. The original manuscript for the book (in D-Mbs; facs., New York, 1972) suggests that he may have spent large parts of his life in Germany, although no other evidence is known to support this. The book contains 101 plates beautifully engraved by J.G. Puschner. Each plate shows a dance scene in stage settings typical for touring companies of the period (for illustration see FOLIA). All costumed male and female characters are presented by men (Lambranzi served as a model for most of the illustrations). At the bottom of each plate there are suggestions for the steps and the manner of performance. The melody for each dance is given at the top of each plate (similar to Feuillet's printed dance notations, which Lambranzi knew quite well). The subjects of the dances range from commedia dell'arte scenes to national dances, represented by a variety of craftsmen and grotesque characters. In the preface Lambranzi claimed that the dance tunes were his own compositions, but it is likely that he used a repertory of popular song and dance melodies that he came to know while touring Europe (66 tunes, for example, are from John Playford's editions of country dances). It is probable that Lambranzi's book was intended for use in schools and universities, where theatrical performance practice was an important part of the curriculum.

A Giovan Battista Lambranzi worked as a painter and scenographer in Venice during the last third of the 17th century; whether he was related to Gregorio Lambranzi is unknown.

Lambuleti, Johannes (fl 14th century). French or Spanish composer. He was possibly a member of the same family as Edmon and Gerónimo Lambullet, active at the court chapel of Alfonso V of Aragon in 1416 and 1422 (see Gómez, 106–7), and his name appears near the end of the second voice of the Kyrie of the so-called Sorbonne Mass (ed. in CMM, xxix, 1962, pp.6, 59, 123, 131, 138, and PMFC, xxxiii/A, 1989, pp.1–27). He may have been the composer of the complete mass setting, which includes a two-voice Benedicamus Domino, since there are relationships between the movements of the mass, and since also the movements are all based on mass settings in I-IV (with the exception of the Benedicamus Domino). The Gloria and Sanctus are incomplete, and the Credo is missing.

GILBERT REANEY

Lam Bun-ching (b Macau, 26 June 1954). Macanese composer. She graduated from the Chinese University of Hong Kong (1976), then completed the PhD (1981) at the University of California at San Diego, studying composition with Erickson, Oliveros, Rands and Reynolds. From 1981 to 1986 she taught at Cornish College of the Arts, Seattle. Since then, living in New York, she has concentrated on composing. She has been composer-in-residence for the American Dance Festival, Durham, North Carolina (1986), and been involved in several Meet the Composer programmes. Awards include a first prize at Aspen, Colorado (1980), the Prix de Rome (1992) and the Lili Boulanger Award (1992), as well as inclusion in the ISCM World Music Days in 1988.

Works such as Springwaters (1980) display a sensitive, eclectic ear for harmony (after Debussy and Takemitsu) and a strong sense of instrumental colour, also apparent in a series of commissions for instruments, ranging from the cello and trombone to the pipa, which owe much to Lam's involvement with performers. Traditional Chinese music and calligraphy seem reflected in moments of stillness, punctuated by intense activity, as in After Spring (written for Oppens and the Arditti Quartet), although overtly Chinese gestures are rare. Her music reflects contact with both the Western and Asian avant garde (Oliveros, Cage, Yuasa, Takemitsu) and a fondness for classical harmony and metre, strikingly juxtaposed. A significant strand is the series of 'spring' pieces (1976–1992), while notable too is an increasing use of Chinese instruments, beginning with Impetus (for the Hong Kong Chinese Orchestra) and continuing in a number of commissions from 1991 onwards. The Child God, for a Chinese shadow puppet play, was acclaimed at the New York Bang on a Can Festival in 1993.

Lamellophone [lamellaphone]. A musical instrument whose sound is generated essentially by the vibration of thin lamellae (Lat. lamella, from lamina: 'a thin plate or layer') or tongues (hence the term 'linguaphone') of metal, wood or other material. Here, however, the term 'lamellophone' is not used for free-reed aerophones such as the Jew's harp, Accordion or the European Mouth organ, nor for the European Musical box, but for another type of idiophone found throughout many regions of sub-Saharan Africa and in Latin America.

the 19th and 20th centuries: (i) Eastern Nigeria and the Cameroon grasslands (ii) West-Central Africa's Equatorial Zone (iii) Southern-Central-African savanna (iv) The Zimbabwe-Zambezi region (v) Northern Mozambique and the Ruvuma valley (vi) East Africa: Uganda, Tanzania (vii) The West Africa diaspora. 7. Latin America.

1. INTRODUCTION. Lamellophones form a particularly important and much ramified family of African musical instruments.

A lamellophone produces sound when a lamella (or tongue), fixed at one end (by a great variety of means) and free at the other, is caused to vibrate by being gently depressed and then released by the player. As far as we know lamellophones with a complex structure and technology evolved only in sub-Saharan Africa. They represent a development of the principle outlined above: a number of lamellae are prepared for use, laid in order, fixed over a soundboard and tuned reciprocally. The soundboard may be a flat board or a resonator of various shapes, such as box- or bell-shaped. The lamellae can be attached in a wide variety of ways. On an exceptional type of instrument found in the lower Ruvuma Valley in Mozambique, Tanzania, they are hooked into the wood, but the most common method involves fixing them to a pressure bar placed between two strips of wood, which serve respectively as backrest and bridge. Extending over the bridge, the free end of each lamella can be a different length, and that determines its pitch (fig.1).

1. Diagram of an African lamellophone

In the course of the lamellophone's history, countless forms developed in sub-Saharan Africa. Until about the middle of the 20th century, before the instruments disappeared from many areas in sub-Saharan Africa, there was great diversity in technical devices and playing techniques (Laurenty, 1962; Kubik and Malamusi 1985–7; Borel, 1986; Kubik, Berlin, 1999, and Los Angeles, 1999). In the wake of the slave trade, some types of lamellophone spread from Africa to other regions of the world, including various parts of the Caribbean, Central and South America. There are large collections of lamellophones in European museums from the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

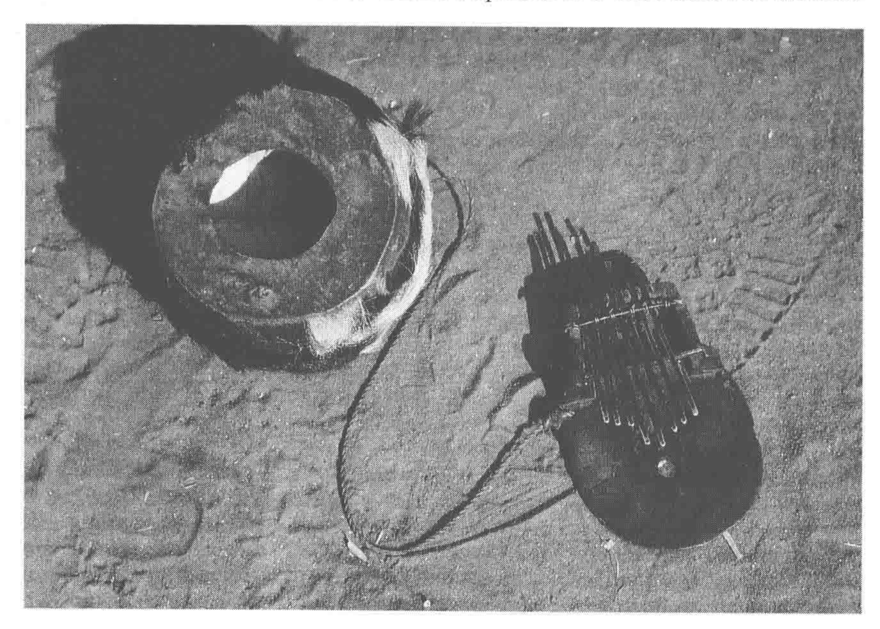
2. Terminology. In ethnographic and travel literature in European languages, African lamellophones are referred to by a variety of terms including 'hand piano', 'thumb piano', 'pianino', even 'Kaffir piano' and 'Klimper' (the German equivalent of 'joanna'). Sometimes local names were reported in the orthographic systems of the various European languages, and occasionally distorted. Thus the Kimbundu term kisanji entered the Portuguese language as quissange. A famous example of a corrupted form that was reported is 'sansa' (also 'sanza', 'zanza'), referring to a common designation of the instrument in the lower Zambezi valley (Mozambique); nsansi (in Chiyungwe) or sansi (in the Maravi languages); the error seems to go back to Charles Livingstone.

The adoption of a local name, distorted or not, in a European language also regularly entailed some form of generalization. The specific local expression was interpreted as an African generic term for this group of instruments. One example is the generalization of the word mbira, indigenous to Zimbabwe; in the literature this has been used sometimes to denote not only West African lamellophones that were never called mbira but even Caribbean and Latin American instruments.

The word 'Lamellophon' was used for the first time by Kubik (1966) and has since become accepted in the major European languages ('lamellophone' in French and English; 'lamelofone' in Portuguese, etc.).

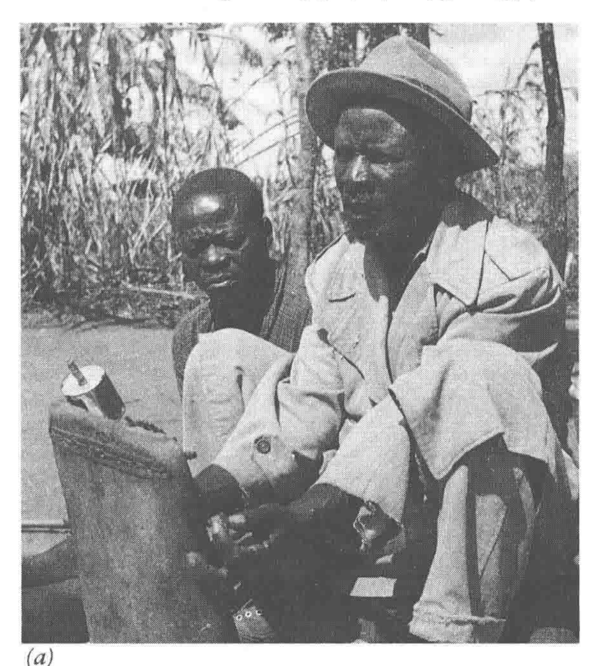
Table 1 illustrates some common names for lamellophones in African languages. In spite of this variety, especially in Bantu languages, many of the names display common word-stems: -limba or -rimba; -mbila or -mbira; -sansi or -sanji; and -kembe. Some are identical in lamellophone and xylophone names of Central and south-east Africa. This suggests that an analogy is felt by the speakers of these languages.

3. Typology, tuning and playing techniques. African lamellophones can be classified according to organology, playing techniques and other principles. Tracey's Handbook for Librarians (1948) and distribution map (1961), use a system based on the type of resonator summarized as follows:



2. Lamellophone from south-west Angola with 16 metal tongues in a V-shape, with wax on the undersides at the ends; Kwisi people, Namibe province

(i) Rectangular board. Also termed 'board lamellophone'. This type most often has an external resonator, usually a gourd-calabash, e.g. the ocisanji in central and south-western Angola (fig.2).



(ii) Fan-shaped soundboard, mostly with edges raised at the sides. This also has an external resonator, e.g. the kalimba of the Chewa in Malawi and eastern Zambia (fig.3).

(iii) Bell-shaped resonator. The defining trait is that the resonator, like a bell, is open in one direction, namely towards the player's stomach e.g. the Loango coast type, several Zimbabwe-Zambezi types such as the matepe and nyonganyonga, the sasi (fig.4) of the Khokola at Lake Chilwa, and the mucapata of the Cokwe in Angola (fig.5).

(iv) Box-shaped resonator. This is usually rectangular, but sometimes trapezoid. It is often hollowed-out from one piece and closed by a strip of wood e.g. the likembe (fig.6). The agidigbo of the Yoruba of Nigeria has an oversized resonator made from a crate (fig.7).

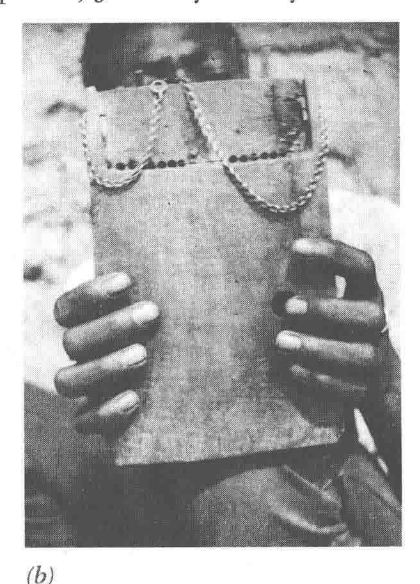
(v) Other specific shapes. These include the 'raft' made of raffia straw (as in Cameroon), and the 'dish', with board attached by nails or glue, as in Gabon.

Irregular shapes in addition to Hugh Tracey's basic categories are frequently found in parts of Central Africa (from Gabon and southern Cameroon) to coastal areas of eastern Nigeria. Tracey's categories have been refined and modified to meet specific regional requirements by other writers, including Borel (1986), Dias (1986), De Hen (1960) and Laurenty (1962). Laurenty drew up a scheme of classification for the huge variety of lamellophones from the Democratic Republic of Congo preserved in the Musée Royale de l'Afrique Centrale in Tervuren.

Working with mbira players in Zimbabwe, Andrew Tracey (1972) discovered that musicians in this culture area think in terms of the tuning layout rather than organological features. Layout tends to be constant, in contrast with the actual intervals, which vary considerably from one musician to another; sometimes even a single musician may appear to have changed the tuning from occasion to occasion. For this reason, Tracey introduced a technique of notation that elucidates the tuning layout, pentatonic or heptatonic, without being diverted by the details of individual margins of tolerance (fig.8).

Various devices are used to modify timbre and to produce sympathetic resonance, for instance: threading pieces of shell or bottle-tops and attaching them to the resonator ; fixing rings individually around the lamellae, specific to likembe box-resonated lamellophones (fig.6); laying a string of beads or pieces of metal across the tongues as in the malimba of south-west Tanzania but also the asologun of the Bini of Nigeria; threading rings on a metal bar in a bell-shaped wooden resonator as on the matepe of the Shona and the mucapata of the Cokwe of Angola (fig.4); glueing a membrane from an African house-spider's nest over a hole in the middle of the soundboard, most common on the small lamellophones with fan-shaped soundboards of eastern Zambia and the central region of Malawi (fig.3) but also a feature of the box-resonated ilimba of the Gogo of Tanzania; and attaching vibrating pins to the upper side of raffia lamellae, as with the lamellophones of the Tikar and Vute in Cameroon.



The most common way of playing lamellophones is using the thumbs to depress and release the tongues. Lamellophones with box-shaped resonators may have a soundhole in the back, manipulated by the middle finger of the left hand during play to modify the timbre and to produce a 'wowing' effect (fig.6*b*). In Zimbabwe and the lower Zambezi region, thumbs and index fingers of both hands are often used with the index fingers plucking the lamellae from below. This technique is also found in the Cameroon grasslands among the Tikar and neighbouring groups.

The coast of West Africa is home to some unusual playing techniques and playing positions, for example the kondi of Sierra Leone (van Oven, 1973–4) which seems to be played 'reversed'.

4. EARLY HISTORY. Organological characteristics, as well as aspects of playing technique and terminology, suggest historical connections between the lamellophones and xylophones in Africa. In a letter to the editor of African Music (1973–4), Arthur M. Jones put forward the thesis that lamellophones were conceived as 'portable xylophones'. Jones argued that the scalar layout of eight xylophone slats could have been transformed into a V-shaped layout of eight lamellae, with the lowest note in the middle. Each thumb of the lamellophone player would then have represented one hand only of two xylophonists sitting opposite one another. In other words, according to Jones, two imaginary xylophonists were merged into one person (fig.9).

7. Agidigbo, a Yoruba lamellophone with five tongues and resonator made from a soapbox, played by a relative of the poet Bakare Gbadamosi; Oshogbo, Nigeria, August 1960

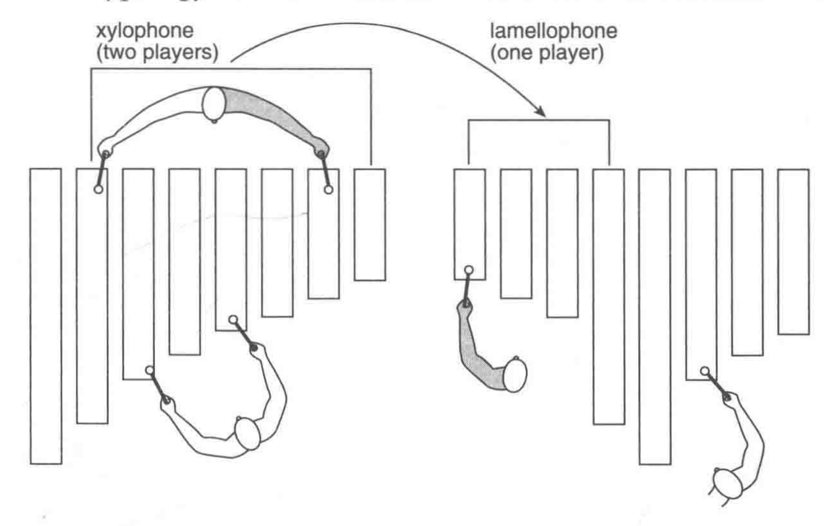
Andrew Tracey reconstructed a 'family tree' of the lamellophones for south-east Africa (1972). He discovered the 'kalimba core', an eight-note tuning pattern hidden in a central part of the tuning layout of most lamellophones (fig.10). This actually exists on some fan-shaped instruments in Zambia. Tracey then successfully reconstructed a genealogy and thereby a relative chronology of lamellophones in south-east Africa.

Archaeological finds have given hints on the early history of lamellophones. Joseph O. Vogel dug up strips of iron at Kumadzulo on the Zambezi in Zambia, which may be lamellophone tongues. Radio-carbon dating put them between the 5th and 7th centuries CE. The similar iron objects which Brian M. Fagan excavated at Kalomo and Kalundu were dated from the 10th or 11th centuries.



The dependence of constructing complex types of lamellophone on the presence of highly developed metallurgy suggests the crucial importance of regions where mining and metalworking were long established. Zimbabwe, parts of Zambia and Mozambique were regions with metallurgical centres from around the beginning of the Later Iron Age. Significantly, the earliest written sources we have about African lamellophones also come from south-east Africa.

There seem to be two historical zones of origin and dispersal of lamellophones. It might be assumed that lamellophones manufactured from materials of the raffia palm existed in west-central Africa, in Gabon, southern Cameroon and possibly eastern Nigeria before the Bantu dispersal started about 2500 years ago and that the technique spread with migrations from west-central Africa to central and south-eastern Africa where metal-manufactured versions were developed with the increase in iron technology. Lamellophones were introduced to East Africa from the Congo and, with the exception of the Ruvuma Valley along the Tanzania-Mozambique borders, only became known in East Africa at the end of the 19th century. Along the West African coast, west of the Niger delta, lamellophones were introduced between the 17th and 19th centuries when European coastal shipping brought African crewmen from other parts of the continent to that area.

9. Transference of the playing technique of a log xylophone into that of a small lamellophone (Jones, 1973–4); the left beater of one xylophone player becomes the left thumb of the lamellophone-player while the right beater of the other xylophone player becomes the lamellophone-player's right thumb

10. Andrew Tracey's core model of kalimba tuning in the Zimbabwe-Zambezi valley region missionary Frei João dos Santos (1609) gave a very detailed description of a nine-note lamellophone and reported the name 'ambira' from his travels in the kingdom of Kiteve (east of Zimbabwe) in 1586. Filippo Bonanni's Gabinetto armonico (1722) contains a picture of a lamellophone player, with the caption 'Marimba de Cafri' (probably on the coast of Mozambique).

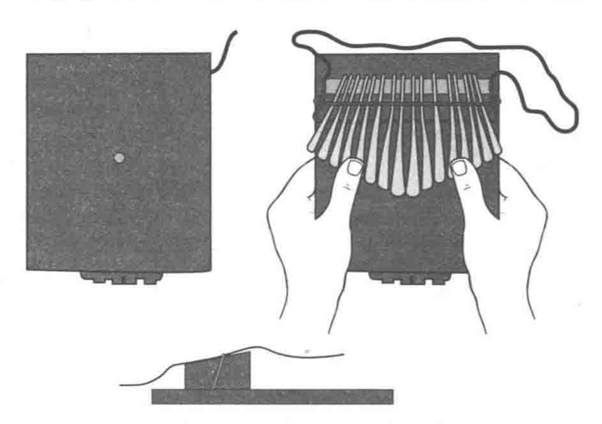
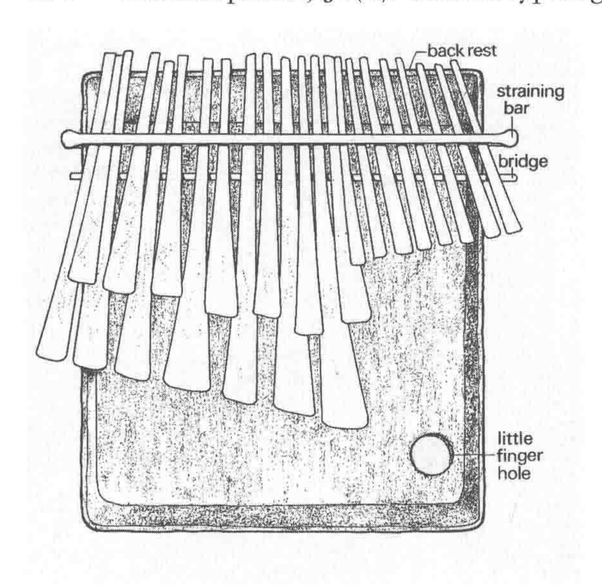
Alexandre Rodrigues Ferreira reported on a 16-note board-type lamellophone made by a slave in north Brazil during the late 18th century. The analysis of his very detailed technical drawing (fig.11) revealed that knowledge of this type must have come from south-west Angola (Kubik 1979).

More sources become available from the mid-19th century, for example in the travel writings of David Livingstone (1865), Carl Mauch (1869–72, Eng. trans., 1969) and Capello and Ivens (1881). Mauch was the first to attempt to transcribe the playing of a mbira dza vadzimu; that of a musician he heard near the ruins of Zimbabwe (Kubik, 1971).



6. African typology and distribution in the 19th and 20th centuries. Seven major regions can be distinguished for the geographical distribution of lamellophones. Each region is associated with specific types.

(i) Eastern Nigeria and the Cameroon grasslands. This is a cohesive distribution area with a long history. The predominant material for constructing the instrument comes from the raffia palm. The soft pith of a raffia leaf stem is used to construct its body, while the tongues are cut from the hard outer skin. The box-shaped 'Calabar' lamellophones from the coast of eastern Nigeria generally have Nsibidi ideographs carved on them. A 'chain stitch' holding the lamellae in place is also characteristic of many instruments from this area.



The Tikar and the Vute in the Cameroon grasslands also have raffia lamellophones. Among the Vute they are tuned in paired octaves. The ubo aka of the Igbo people, exceptionally for the region, has metal tongues. The soundboard is firmly attached to the gourd-resonator, and has crescent-shaped openings on either side of the lamellae into which the player can put his hands. The organological characteristics of the Bini's asologun include a metal chain laid across the lamellae to cause sympathetic resonance.

(ii) West-Central Africa's Equatorial Zone. The lamellophones of this region (from Gabon to the eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo) come in innumerable shapes. They include instruments made of raffia or other vegetable materials and, especially in the south of the region, instruments with metal lamellae and wooden bodies.

One distinctive type is concentrated on the Loango coast and found among the Bafioti, the Manyombe and neighbouring ethnic groups (Laurenty, 1962; fig.4). It is characterized by a bell-shaped resonator carved from a single piece of wood, with a rounded base. The soundhole, facing the player, is often in a half-moon shape. This has religious significance with the moon symbolizing a female transcendental being. The upper end of the resonator is bent slightly forwards, which means that the backrest can often be dispensed with or reduced. Loango lamellophones mostly have seven tongues, but sometimes as many as ten, laid out in ascending order of pitch from left to right.

By the mid-19th century a new type of lamellophone had been invented in the Lower Congo area, that is, the likembe (fig.6). Carried by personnel in the colonial service, it spread along the great rivers, together with the region's lingua franca, Lingala. Coquilhat, the first Belgian colonial agent, who installed himself in the area that became the Belgian Congo in the last decades of the 19th century, described the likembe in his book of 1888 about the upper course of the Congo river. Many specimens from the Bateke people (in the former French Congo) are held in museum collections. Late 19th-century specimens often have imported blue, hexagonal, glass beads around the iron lamellae as a buzzing device. Brass pins were often hammered into the soundboard as decoration (Kubik, Berlin, 1999). In the decade before World War I, the likembe was established everywhere along the Congo river, and known to the Kongo and Mfinu, as well as the Mbuja in the Kisangani vicinity. It had also spread along the Ubangi, where it was reported among Ng'baka musicians and the Ngbandi in 1911–13.

(iii) Southern Central-African savanna. A striking feature of this region (Democratic Republic of the Congo, Angola, northern parts of Zambia, Malawi central region) is the predominance of the word-stem -sansi (with variant forms and different prefixes), as well as -limba. Board lamellophones with gourd resonators were once very popular among the Luba in Katanga, but they are now largely obsolete (Gansemans, 1980, p.27). To the west of the Luba, among the Lunda, board lamellophones called cisanji are known.

Board lamellophones are almost universal throughout Angola, but other forms also exist. Among the Cokwe in the north-east is found the cisaji cakele, an elongated lamellophone made of raffia with a small number of tongues, and cisaji ca kakolondondo, a board lamellophone with raised edges, buzzing rings on a bar on the narrow side of the instrument facing the musician, and usually 10 spatula-shaped iron tongues in a V-shaped layout. The cisaji ca lungandu or cisaji ca mandumbwa, a 12-note board lamellophone with raised edges and a layout in two octave ranks (the pitch ascending from left to right), is also found there. The use of pieces of wax to adjust the tuning, especially for the lower notes, is characteristic of this type. In addition there is the mucapata, which has a bell-shaped resonator, buzzing rings on a stick across the bell opening, 17, 19 or more tongues laid out above two basic notes in up to four sections according to the principle of tonal relationship (fig.5), and the likembe, which has a box-shaped resonator and soundhole.

The tuning of instruments in this region is hexatonic among the Luba and hexa- to heptatonic among the Cokwe and their neighbours. Various organological details of individual types support conjecture that relationships between them exist in two main directions: towards the west, to the Loango coast (see, for instance, the rounded form of the resonator in some mucapata, or the reduction of the backrest); and towards the Zambezi Valley (demonstrated in the great similarity of buzzing devices on mucapata and on matepe from Zimbabwe, the tray-shape of the kakolondondo and lugandu types, and finally, above all on the cisaja ca lungandu, the layout of lamellae in two ranks.

(iv) The Zimbabwe-Zambezi region. Thanks to the tireless work of Hugh Tracey, and later Andrew Tracey, this is the best researched part of Africa with regard to lamellophones, including their forms and histories. Lamellophones in Zimbabwe and the Zambezi Valley are either tray-shaped, such as the mbira dza vadzimu (fig.12), or have a bell-shaped resonator, such as the nyonganyonga and matepe. A historically-related zone lies to the north of the Zambezi, where the soundboard was often transformed into a fan-shape.

The body is usually carved from a single piece of wood; in many types the bell-shaped resonator is hollowed out from one direction. Andrew Tracey considers the mbira dza vadzimu as a very old, perhaps even the oldest, form of lamellophone among the Shona. In his genealogical table (1972) he distinguished an early type with the bass notes in the right-hand playing area from a later type with the bass notes in the left-hand playing area. The mbira dza vadzimu was used in connection with religious ceremonies for ancestral spirits (vadzimu). The gourd resonator is called deze, a name also often given to the instrument itself. The body is a rectangular 'tray', with raised edges and mostly 22 to 23 lamellae, in three ranks. Three fingers are used in playing: the two thumbs and the right-hand index finger. The index finger 'scratches' (kukwenya) the rank of treble lamellae on the right in an upward motion from below.

Like other Zimbabwean mbira music, music for the mbira dza vadzimu is constructed on chord sequences between four degrees displaying bi-chords in 4ths or 5ths. Many cycles cover 48 elementary pulses. Today the instrument is usually played in duet, and accompanied by rattles known as hosho. The opening part is called in Shona kushaura ('start', 'lead'); the second part, which combines with the first, is played on a second mbira and called kutsinhira ('exchange', 'sing a refrain'). The vocal part often includes yodelling (kunguridzira in Shona) and 'singing the bass' (kuhongera).

There were very few players of this instrument left in the Shona-Karanga-speaking area in the 1930s. From the 1970s onwards its popularity revived, stimulated by the studies of ethnomusicologists and the awakening of national consciousness as part of the struggle for national liberation (chimurenga) in Zimbabwe, but this took place above all in the Shona-Zezuru-speaking area and resulted in a kind of mbira revival music.

Lamellophones are also known to the neighbours of the Shona people. There are three main types among the Ndau: tomboji, mostly played by old people (distributed south of the town of Umtali); danda, a development of the tomboji; and utee, characterized by soft-sounding low notes. Ndau lamellophones differ in tuning and layout from those of the Shona. The most important types of lamellophone among the Chikunda in the Lower Zambezi Valley are the njari huru; among the Korekore, the hera, mana embudzi and nyonganyonga. The nyonganyonga type is called malimba among the Dzimba and Phodzo. On the periphery of this region there is a large type with 15 or 16 tongues and a bell-shaped body, called sasi among the Khokola in the neighbourhood of Lake Chilwa, Malawi.

There is a direct historical link between the Zimbabwe-Zambezi types and the development of small fan-shaped instruments in the Tete area, some of them also having two ranks of tongues, one above the other. On their progress northwards from the 17th century to the 19th, fan-shaped lamellophones were simplified and the number of tongues reduced. Fan-shaped types also spread upstream along the Zambezi river.

(v) Northern Mozambique and the Ruvuma valley. There are two types of lamellophone in this region. One, called shitata by the Shirima, Lomwe and related populations, and shityatya (or cityatya) by the Makonde, is a board lamellophone with rounded ends to the often narrow, rectangular board, and only seven or eight lamellae (mostly made from old umbrella spokes). The board is fixed over a gourd resonator.

The other type appears to be found only among the Makonde and Mwera. It is one of the strangest lamellophones in Africa, and has aroused great interest among scholars. Margot Dias, following her field-research among the Makonde (1957–9; papers held in the Museu Etnográfico, Lisbon), pursued the type through every museum in Europe. Examples in the Musikinstrumenten-Museum in Munich were analysed closely by M.A. Malamusi, Lidiya Malamusi and Gerhard Kubik. These types, called ulimba or lulimba, are characterized by a number of features. The resonator, carved from a single piece and slightly rounded, has an upwards-tilted top section with an edge shaped somewhat like a roof gable. The resonator is closed at the back by a very close-fitting piece of thin board. All the wooden parts are reddish-brown and highly polished. There are several small holes in the soundboard, arranged in specific, sometimes cruciform patterns. The iron lamellae are relatively wide and carefully filed, with their ends either rounded or slightly pointed. They are immovably hooked into the resonator at the point where the 'gable' starts, so that a backrest is unnecessary. The tuning cannot be altered. The layout is V-shaped. Nearly all the instruments are seven-tongued, with a pentatonic tuning. The lowest note is in the middle.

It has been suggested that this type of lamellophone is historically related to metallophones in Indonesia, in particular the saron burang (Kubik and Malamusi, 1985–7). Indonesian gamelans were probably the original source of inspiration of East African trough xylophones, which occur on the Indian Ocean coast among the Zaramo (Tanzania) and the Cuambo of Quelimane (Mozambique) and even in the region of Lake Chilwa and Mount Mulanje (Jones, 2/1971). It is conceivable that the Makonde-Mwera type of lamellophone was inspired by toy or model gamelans seen when they reached the east coast of Africa centuries ago on merchant ships. Certain distinguishing elements were preserved but the metal tongues were turned at right angles (see also Kubik, Berlin, 1999, and Los Angeles, 1999).

(vi) East Africa: Uganda, Tanzania. The history of the lamellophone in this region, beginning just before the turn of the century, has been reconstructed in every detail, especially in Uganda. Ugandan types derive from the likembe, which first reached the western and north-western area of the country; in the south it was also called Kongo, from its provenance. Alur and Acooli workers adopted the box-resonated lamellophone from the Logo and other intermediary peoples in north-eastern Congo (via the town of Mahagi). In about 1912 they brought it to the Basoga in the area of Jinja in the south, where the Uganda railway was being constructed at that time. Basoga musicians adopted it, but called it by a name in their own language, endongo (lyre), and began to play pieces for embaire (xylophone) on it, eventually giving rise to a new style.

Lamellophones in central Tanzania, such as the ilimba of the Gogo, were inspired by instruments that Nyamwezi traders from eastern Congo had brought to Tabora before the beginning of the 20th century. The layout of the lamellae follows the Gogo tuning system, which derives from the 4th to the 9th partial over a single fundamental, and was developed locally (Kubik, 1994). The presence of a central soundhole in the soundboard, covered with a spider's-web nest-covering in order to create sympathetic resonance, especially with the bass tongues, indicates connections with types of lamellophone in north-east Zambia. The buzzing-rings placed around the lamellae and the box-resonator with a soundhole in the back were probably inspired by the likembe of Congo.

Small lamellophones, mostly called malimba, also spread into south-western Tanzania from Zambia. According to oral tradition the town of Tukuyu became a secondary distribution centre. These types are also distinct from the likembe, in spite of some shared features (box-resonator, soundhole etc.). The chain laid at right angles across the lamellae is characteristic of this type. Among the Kisi, Pangwa, Bena, Nyakyusa and their neighbours, instruments were developed capable of producing prominent 'wow' effects by the technique of opening and closing the soundhole at the back of the resonator.

(vii) The West African diaspora. Most authors agree that lamellophones were not indigenous to the African coast west of the Niger delta but were carried there by African crew members on European ships, just as they were to the New World. There were a number of factors responsible for the development of the West African diaspora. In 1901 Bernhard Ankermann reported the lamellophone among the Kru of Liberia, in an enclave outside the compact distribution area east of the Niger delta. The Kru ('crew') are known to have played a crucial role in the diffusion of musical instruments along the Guinea coast through their position as crewmen on European ships. These sailors also adopted instruments that they came across in other parts of Africa. After 1815, the resettlement of slaves (liberated by the British navy from many parts of Africa) also led to the transplantation of elements of musical culture to their new homes in Freetown, Sierra Leone, and Libreville, Gabon. Similarly, the repatriation of African Americans from Brazil after the abolition of slavery there in 1888 led to the reintroduction of an Afro-Caribbean model into West African ports, notably Lagos, Nigeria. One derivative type of lamellophone, the agidigbo, has been prominent since then among the Yoruba. During the 20th century, further diffusionary processes were stimulated by movements along footpaths and roads between neighbouring West African territories under European rule. This was linked with the phenomenon of itinerant workers and migration into urban centres, which created, for example, the Yoruba communities in Accra, Ghana.

A lamellophone used by itinerant workers called a gidigbo has been documented among the Fõ in Togo and the Reepublic of Benin (Kubik, 1989). An oval fish tin serves as resonator and a thin piece of wood is cut to fit it exactly, to act as soundboard. There are only five lamellae (made from old umbrella spokes), fixed to the soundboard by having a strip of tin laid across them, and nails hammered between each one. A straight length of iron wire is forced underneath them to lift the ends ready to play. These pentatonically-tuned tongues are laid out in a V-shape. The gidigbo is played in an unusual position: it is held 'upside down', pinned vertically between the player's knees with the soundboard facing away from the player and the free ends of the lamellae pointing upwards so that they may be plucked with the index fingers. There is an alternative position, with the instrument still held 'upside down' but turned in such a way that the thumbs can reach the soundboard from above. Similar playing positions occur in Sierra Leone.

The existence of identical names for lamellophones among the Fõ and the Yoruba is significant, although they refer to different types. According to Valentine Ojo (Kubik, 1989), gidigbo in Yoruba means 'wrestling match', and came to be applied to lamellophones because they were used to accompany such fights. Technologically the agidigbo is analogous to the Fõ instrument, but a large crate (usually a soapbox) forms the resonator and the lamellae are made from broad pieces of metal, such as the remnants of old, thin sawblades. The shape of the soundhole in the lid is very reminiscent of the Caribbean marimbula, but also, ultimately, of shapes found in numerous lamellophones of the Cameroon grasslands.

Since the 1970s there has been an increasing tendency to equip the Yoruba agidigbo with a pickup and an electric amplifier: this is the case with many àpàla music groups and also in Juju music.

7. Latin America. During the 19th century lamellophones were taken by African slaves to various parts of the New World. Ewbank reported its great popularity among Africans in Rio de Janeiro in 1856 and described a calabash-resonated instrument. The instrument has also been reported in Louisiana and as far south as Montevideo, Uruguay, where in the 1950s it was still known as quisanche, which is the cisanji of southern central Africa. Variants of the name 'marimba' (e.g. malimba, marímbula) have been reported in the Caribbean; there the instrument is still popular, whereas in South America it appears to be obsolescent.

Ortiz's survey (1952–5) of Afro-Cuban instruments mentions the small type, commonly held in the lap of seated performers. But by the 1970s the large box-resonated instrument, the size and shape of a small suitcase, was apparently much more popular. Thompson (1971) described its manufacture and use in the Caribbean area in some detail. He reported that in Haiti and Dominica the instruments usually have three or four steel tongues, whereas in Cuba and Puerto Rico they have ten or more, now often made from knifeblades. The player sits on the instrument, reaching down to sound the keys with the fingers of one hand while beating out sometimes complex rhythms on the sides and front of the box with the other hand.

In Jamaica, where it is known as the 'rumba-box', the instrument is also used in the ensembles of religious groups such as the Rastafarians. Like the prempensua in Ghana it serves to replace drums.

Western percussion manufacturers such as the German firm Kolberg make a lamellophone called a 'marimbula' with a two-octave compass (c–c″). This has been adopted by composers such as Henze (Violin Concerto no.2, 1971; Tristan, 1972–3; Voices, 1973) and Thomas Adès (The Origin of the Harp, 1994).

Lament. A term associated not only with mourning rites for the dead but also with ritual leave-taking, as in the case of a bride parting from her family or a mother's farewell to a son recruited on war service (in many societies, perhaps most, the role of lamenter is taken by women; see WOMEN IN MUSIC, §III). The ritual character of laments embodies notions of transition to another state or world and the possibility of symbolic renewal. Funeral laments, although they mark a universal fact, are not found throughout the world; nor, where they are found, are they analogous in structure or style. On the contrary, they differ just as the rites associated with them vary from one region to another. The predominantly vocal expression of grief in lament rituals is complemented in some cultures by instrumental music and movement that carries symbolic or numinous force; speech, poetry and dance may also play a part. The notion of lament can extend into other traditional genres such as ballad or epic, especially through performance style: 'lamenting' can be an interpretative approach to song or chant, a style as much as a genre. The range of symbolic functions can range from genuine mourning or parting to complaints about status in the community, or to contact with the preternatural or spirit world.

Lamenting draws on a wide set of vocal mannerisms from culture to culture, and often parallels such genres as the lullaby, especially when an improvisatory style is used. This improvisation, however, usually follows formulaic, ritualized patterns of vocal gesture, just as the funeral events themselves are highly structured. Vocal laments tend to move within a narrow melodic range of a 5th or less, although some, beginning in a high or middle register, descend as much as an octave or more. Vocal techniques used include sobbing, voiced inhalation, slow vibration of the vocal cords and falsetto. Laments often bring into focus the boundaries of speech and song, composition in performance and gender- or emotion-related issues. Their increasing rarity in the Western world has occasionally resulted in the re-creation of lamenting as a phenomenon of cultural tourism. (For discussion of different types of lament and nomenclature see APOTHÉOSE; DÉPLORATION; DIRGE; DUMP; ELEGY; EPICEDIUM; LAMENTO; NENIA; PIBROCH; PLAINTE; PLANCTUS; THRENODY; and THRĒNOS).

1. Europe. 2. Central and East Asia. 3. South-east Asia and Melanesia. 4. The Middle East and Africa. 5. The Americas.

1. EUROPE. Vocal laments are found in many rural communities, even into the 20th century, more often in Catholic or Orthodox than in Protestant countries. Examples have been recorded and studied in Finland, Hungary, Ireland, throughout the Mediterranean and the Balkans, and in Russia, where Stravinsky famously adapted and modified the structure and style of wedding laments for The Wedding (1921–3). For funeral laments a distinction can be made between the improvised, ritual wailing over the body or at the graveside and the more considered poetic tribute made by a local composer. The distinction was known in ancient Greece: the epikedeion over the dead body, and the thrēnos in memory of the dead. The two styles can merge, however, as in Bulgaria, where each utterance is a fragment of a melodic and poetic whole that exists in the singer's mind in many variants and dominates her thoughts after the utterance is past. The ritual lament accompanying a major rite of passage often involves weeping, sobbing and cries of grief. Sometimes the lamenter praises the departed, calling attention to their beauty or strength of character, or adopts an accusatory tone, bewailing their abandonment of those who live on. In most societies the lamenters are women past childbearing age who are honoured and recompensed for their knowledge and skill, being thought to have special power relating to the passage of the deceased to the otherworld. In many areas these rites were opposed by Christian churches as pagan or at least unsupported by dogma: the church hierarchy in Ireland, for example, passed numerous ordinances in the 17th and 18th centuries against the practice of keening.

Lamenting in Ireland (keening), first referred to in a 7th-century eulogy for St Cummain the Tall, has been described since at least the 17th century, and during the 19th century Edward Bunting and others attempted to notate its melodic shape. The keen, or 'Irish cry', was performed over the body in the house, during the procession to the graveyard, and at the burial itself. The usual number of hired keeners was four; one, standing near the head of the bed or table on which the body lay, began the dirge with the first note of the cry, which was followed by a note or part of equal length sung by a mourner at the feet. The long or double part was then sung by mourners at the side, after which family and friends would join in the common chorus at the end of each stanza. Lamentations at wakes and funerals were often in the form of extempore songs; E. O'Curry (On the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish, London, 1873) cited one such by the deceased's younger brother, who recounted his genealogy, eulogized his family's honour and described his childhood and youth. Then, changing the melody, he sang of his skills, his wooing and marriage, and ended by 'suddenly bursting into a loud, piercing, but exquisitely beautiful wail, which was again taken up by the bystanders'. Elegies were usually composed at a later stage. Keening was recorded as late as the 1950s in the Aran Islands, though out of context and with some wariness because of the opposition of the Catholic church. Ritual lamenting of this kind contrasts markedly with the merrymaking and horseplay that often accompanied wakes in Ireland.

The practice of keening lasted less long in Scotland, where the Reformation opposed it more resolutely from the 17th century on. Traces of keening, however, have lingered in Catholic areas of the Hebrides; the three-part keen included repeating the name of the deceased, a dirge (tuiream) invoking his or her virtues, and the cry (goll), a chorus of non-lexical syllables. The bagpipe became something of a surrogate for the human voice, and stirring ceòl mór has been composed around the notion of lament (cumha), although it is now rare for a piper to play ceòl mór at the graveside. The Highland Clearances of the 19th century sometimes resulted in lament-like reactions from the people: one observer (A. Geikie, Scottish Reminiscences, Glasgow, 1904) was startled by the sound of a communal wail 'like a funeral coronach' from the inhabitants of a Skye township as they made their way along the road, departing unwillingly from their ancestral crofts. Lamenting can thus become a collective expression of grief rather than, as in shamanistic enactment, an individual conjoining with the spirit world.

Along the Atlantic littoral and into the Mediterranean, laments have been recorded in Portugal, Spain and Corsica. In Corsica, the singer (voceratrice) improvises a lament (vocero) at the foot of the table where the corpse is laid out. In former times keening over the body of a murdered relative could incite the mourning family to a blood feud. Keening is practised by Albanian groups in central and southern Italy, where some laments resemble Transylvanian types; lamenting by Italians continues in those regions and in the islands, though no longer in the north. The Roma of Europe lament even before death takes place, while those present continue to chat, smoke and drink beside the dying person. When the death is announced there is collective weeping; men whimper and cry bitterly. Among some groups the lamenting continues long into the night, subsequently changing to rhythmic chanting. Even the children wail. Musicians normally play before the lowering of the coffin into the grave. The funeral chants, according to J.-P. Clébert (Les tziganes, Paris, 1961), are improvised and, more important, are never repeated. Their ephemeral nature enhances their value.

In Russia, where the practice of lamenting is widespread, the terms used vary according to region: plach ('weeping', 'crying') is used for traditional laments in general, especially in central and western villages, whereas prichet' ('reciting', 'counting'), whose text is often a bitter litany of complaint, is characteristic of north Russia. The voiced beginning or ending of a breath cycle may be marked by a loud inhalation or exhalation, termed vopl', one of many intonational devices found in Russian laments. A woman lamenter is called plakal'shchitsa ('she who cries'), voplenitsa ('she who wails'), vytnitsa ('she who howls') or prichitalka ('she who recites'). Although a lamenter might be singled out as specially skilled, in many local traditions every woman was expected to be able to lament. The Molokan or Spiritual Christian sect have a special concept of 'fine singer' (khoroshii pevets) for members who aid communication with the divine by their singing during communal worship. Their intercessions resemble village lamenting in that sobs, tears and wailing mingle with songs and recitation.

The same women who lament over the dead in Russian villages are often invited to lament for brides. In most local traditions, wedding and funeral laments share the same melodic formulae. The wedding lament is composed of episodes ordered according to local tradition and embodies impersonal responses to a ritualized situation: young persons entering a new stage of life must undergo a symbolic death of their former selves. The wedding lament is performed on the bride's behalf by a woman who knows the tradition and leads the ceremony. Weddings fall into two parts, the first symbolizing the separation of the bride and groom from their previous lives, the second dealing with the wedding festivities and rituals to ensure good fortune. Laments were essential to the first part but were not permitted to cross into the feast; this division was paralleled in the funeral ritual. The first lament might conclude the matchmaking episode; during the following weeks the bride laments at dawn and sunset each day and while bidding farewell to her family and home. Such laments might be combined with choral song, which does not belong to the category of wedding songs proper. Two musical layers result, an upper one saturated with exclamations and sobs, moving in free time; and a lower one with a rigid syllabification that is strongly accented and songlike. Similarly, the pitch level in the upper layer is subject to fluidity and nuance, while the lower pitch level is stable throughout (Balashov and others, 1985; Mazo, 'Wedding Laments', 1994).

Every Russian lament is unique, being created anew even when it follows prescribed patterns. The associations surrounding the performance can affect those present even before the lament begins, as when the lamenter covers her eyes with a shawl. Although laments have been sung for the singer alone, the response of those in attendance is normally regarded as important: Vologda women would always comment on whether everyone wept, and which words the lamenter used. Small details of regional or village custom in lamenting, such as 'thin voice' (high register), were felt to be significant and helped define the local style. The singers draw a distinction here between 'the tune' and 'the voice', and distinguish similarly between 'singing' and 'lamenting'. The former is associated with a fixed and stable set of pitches, while the latter has a gliding pitch contour and intervals (popevki) that vary within the same melodic gesture. Professional lamenters make a clear distinction between stability and instability in the scale degrees for a performance; under selfconscious conditions they are likely to select a more formal interpretation based on fixed pitches. Observers including Istomin and Dyutsh (1894) have also described a practice termed khlyostan′e or khryostan′e in which a lamenter drops to the floor with an exclamation such as 'O mamon′ka' or 'O-oi, okh-kho khoi!' before rising and continuing to lament.

In Karelia, where the population underwent forced relocation during and after World War II, the lament seems to typify an ancient Finno-Ugric melodic pattern also found in Hungarian laments: a descending unison pentachord or solo melody consisting of a single constantly embellished phrase with alternating cadences on the second and first scale degrees. This pattern, distributed widely among Finno-Ugric peoples, is related to the Te Deum melody (Kiss and Rajeczky, 1966). The first mention of a Balto-Finnic lament tradition is in 1210, when Estonians were said to bury their war dead with laments and drinking. Finnish laments are mentioned in Bishop Agricola's Psalter of 1551. Johann Gottlieb Georgi included an account of Ingrian lamenting in his description of Russia and its territories (1776), mentioning specifically the custom of bringing food and money to the grave and quoting a fragment of lament text. The earliest surviving texts were recorded by Elias Lönnrot, compiler of the Finnish national epic, Kalevala, in 1836. Lönnrot mentioned the crying and sobbing that accompanied lament performance, and that the texts were only partly comprehensible. Lamenters themselves are not always able to explain the language of the laments, even though Karelian is intelligible to Finnish speakers. The recondite language appears to link the lament, especially at the outset where the pitches are unstable, to both older epic singing and shamanistic practice. Preternatural power resides in such expression. While the pitches, mode, range and phrase structure were also fluid within the performance, the power of the lament clearly had a transformative effect on those present. As in Russia, the Karelian lamenter might cover her eyes with a shawl or apron and even simulate a sorrowful demeanour as a means of inducing the appropriate psychic state. During the lament the other women present would yield to crying or quiet sobbing while the lament itself would rise in strength and in pitch. The overall structure, however, is a descending melodic phrase within the range of a 4th or 5th. Lamenters may be competitive and critical, since lamenting is the main source of prestige in their old age. They value a good lamenter for her ability to 'find words', to affect others, and by her effectiveness within the ritual. As a device to communicate with the spirit world, the lament was sacred in nature. In Finland women who learnt to lament in the original traditional context sometimes display their art in a folkloristic arena such as the 'tourist cabin' in Nurmes, east Finland. In this way the singers become mediators of fragments of their own culture.

Hungarian lamenting forms a link with Finno-Ugric and Ob-Ugrian musical types and follows a performance pattern found elsewhere in east Europe. Traditional laments in Hungary have been recorded with singular thoroughness since the beginning of the 20th century when Bartók and Kodály began their field research, and the number of laments (and parodies, usually by children) increased vastly around the mid-century. Kodály in particular drew attention to the improvisatory nature of vocal lamenting in Hungary. Often the lamenter was the nearest female relative of the deceased, and those present would comment on the quality and sincerity of the lament. The inspirational aspect results in sections of unequal length ending with pauses, irregular repetition of melodic phrases, and a melodic structure tied to the freely flowing prose and consisting of two descending lines sometimes covering an octave, sometimes a 4th or 5th. The tonal structure is usually diatonic, though occasionally pentatonic turns are heard. Notably, the 'complaints' of the Székely people represent a transitional form between the local pentatonic lament and pentatonic strophic melodies, perhaps indicating a development from improvised lament to song types with stanzas having fixed numbers of syllables to a line. In some counties rhymed texts are sung to a pre-existing tune, the individual expression of grief giving way to a typical standard text; this too can be considered a lament since it is sung by the nearest female relative. During the absence of menfolk at war, women have lamented while engaged in such tasks as spinning (Kodály, 1937; Kiss and Rajeczky, 1966).

A similar pattern of lamenting in Romania was described by Brăiloiu (1973). The ceremony involved pieces to be sung by the coffin in the house, on the road to the graveyard and at the graveside. Brăiloiu differentiated these laments from ancient ritual songs sung at the same time, not by relatives, but by chosen women of standing in the community. In the 1990s the style of village lamenting was adapted to comment on the political and social upheavals since 1989. One singer transformed a lament for the dead in her village as a model, stating that her people mourn the dead in various ways, both in a doina-like manner and with words, as if trying to restore them to life. Another remarked that humankind developed the lament as the only means of communication with the dead. In Jewish tradition a woman's long, improvised song provided a means of easing her emotional burden for years afterwards by singing at the graveside.

Albanian women who lament, though needed by the community to communicate with the otherworld, are marked out by that function as powerful and hence to be avoided. The idea of lamenting as a bridge between the worlds of the living and the dead is strong in Greece. In Crete, the 'invitation to mourning' is an important element of lamenting; group catharsis achieved through lamenting reinforces the bond between women for whom suffering is a communicative code. Although women attend wakes primarily to honour individuals, they may also bewail their own misfortunes. Epirot women in north-west Greece lament their shared problems: widowhood, caring for extended or dispersed families, the general sense of loss. The distinction between singing (tragoudia) and lamenting (moirologia), and the metamorphosis of the former to the latter, as well as the prevalence of the lament in declining village traditions, has resulted in some older women expressing reluctance to sing and preferring to lament.

2. Central and East Asia. Russian wedding laments are linked to other Slavonic regions and to the ritual songs and laments of the Kazakh in Central Asia and Georgians in the Caucasus, in particular through the rhythmic formula that breaks the widespread octosyllabic line into 5 + 3 syllables (ex.1). Traces of this rhythm, which may not be Slavonic in origin, have been found in Hungarian wedding songs and among Romanians in Bihor, as well as in Bashkir, Mishar Tatar and Mordvinian wedding laments. In Kazakhstan this rhythmic structure is found only in female ritual songs, namely wedding or funeral laments (zhoktau), but a similar rhythm is used in Kazakh and Kyrgyz epic song, and it is possible that the Kazakh predilection for epic singing has led to the rhythmic model's influencing the structure of other genres, including Slavonic ritual songs. The model also appears in Georgian laments, and it has been suggested that Georgians adapted it from the Siberian-derived Kipchak who settled in Georgia in the early 12th century; evidence of it appears throughout eastern Europe, always in places visited by the Kipchak. But its origin may, rather, lie in contact between the Kipchak and the Bolgars, who had migrated earlier to the Caucasus and whose musical and speech patterns are similar (Zemtsovsky, 1990).

Further east, instruments play an important symbolic role in funeral music. In China and North Vietnam, and among the Hmong, who live in the border regions of Thailand, Myanmar and Laos, the mouth organ and drum feature prominently in the rituals enacted before the funeral. During the ceremony itself a lamenter standing at one side of the body sings out with a loud, descending melody while the spouse of the deceased sobs at the other side. On the death of a Buddhist believer in Kyoto, Japan, five or six old women gather in the home where the funeral is to be held and sing a Buddhist chant (goeika) to the accompaniment of a small bell (chin chin). Funeral processions among Soto Buddhists include a mouth organ (sho), drum, flute and a ritual chant (syomyo). One such chant, termed wasan, is sung in Japan by the Shingon, one of the oldest sects, as they make their customary pilgrimage to 88 temples, often in commemoration of the death of family members.

In Korea, songs known as sangyo-soro are sung by pallbearers during funeral processions. In the cities such pallbearers, though professionals, are a minority group with low social status. In rural societies the villagers arrange the ceremony and carry the bier. A competent male singer leads with a solo which is answered by the others singing a refrain. When the procession begins, the handbell-ringer (yoryong chabi) sings a prologue before the bier while shaking the bell (yoryong). The song text incorporates Confucian, Buddhist and shamanic elements. Sangyo-sori fall into four parts: a slow prologue sung at departure to express the soul's feelings of grief at separation from its village; a processional song on the way to the grave; a song in accelerated tempo when approaching the burial site; and a song for trampling the grave soil after burial. The singing thus contains elements of work songs. The pitch of these songs is variable, and microtonal shadings are often present. On the island of Chindo, south-west of the mainland, burial is preceded by tashiraegi, a performance genre honouring the dead in which women go ahead of the coffin wailing or weeping while men sing dirges.

3. South-east Asia and Melanesia. In Bali, the spirit is believed to remain earthbound until cremation, whereupon it may enter into the cycle of birth, life, death and rebirth. Soon after death, songs termed kakawin, similar to laments but used also in other contexts, are performed. Their texts urge the deceased to leave the house, dispelling fear by describing the wonders of the upper world and the high level of reincarnation the spirit deserves.

In northern New Guinea, elaborate funeral ceremonies lasting 12 hours or more take place in Iatmul villages of the middle Sepik river. The feast for the death of a clan leader is accompanied by paired flutes representing a specific spirit. Their playing is quite independent of the chants sung to the accompaniment of an hourglass drum, split bamboo beater and, occasionally, men's chorus. Before the ceremony the flute players carry their instruments (concealed from women and children) to a special part of the deceased person's house, inside which a screen has been built. The singer begins a chant, the cue for the flutes to enter; symbolically, their playing invites the participation of ancestors. The assembled men of the clan utter a harsh 'Ah' to express wonder and gratification that the ancestors have answered. The Eipo of western New Guinea cultivate laments for the recently dead and the dying. These are performed almost exclusively by women, and consist of spontaneous, emotional singing, sometimes on two pitches a tone apart, interspersed with weeping or crying. The lament begins emphatically, in a loud voice, and ends after several minutes in an introverted manner, with a low voice. There is no Eipo word for this kind of singing, but lamenting in general is termed layelayana.

The Kaluli in the southern highlands of Papua New Guinea have five named patterns of weeping to express grief at loss, abandonment or separation. Three are associated with men; of the two performed by women, sa-yalab is the more refined and aesthetic. It is elaborated through improvised texts and a highly patterned but stable melodic contour based on four descending notes, the first two a major 2nd apart, the next a minor 3rd below and the last a major 2nd below (e.g. D–C–A–G). This pattern is said to derive from the call of the fruit dove; one Kaluli myth connects sadness, birds and human expressive sound. Sa-yalab involves continuous sobbing, streaming of tears and nasal discharge. Voiced inhalation is characteristic, particularly at the beginnings and ends of phrases, giving the effect of short, startled bursts of vocalization. Slower glottal chord vibration results in a somewhat 'raspy' sound.

Although solo sa-yalab is fundamentally monophonic it is less often performed by an individual voice than by two to four women simultaneously, with some interaction as one lamenter responds to or is moved by another. Performance of sa-yalab involves, according to Feld (1990), a process called dulugu ganalan ('lift-up over-sounding'), a spatial-acoustic metaphor that suggests an image of continuous layers of sound, overlapping without internal breaks. Through their wailing the women give voice to personal memories and convey their emotional relationship with one another, the deceased, and their listeners. Themes of food, family, relationship and place are embodied in the texts, which also include place names symbolic of the shared paths in life. A sa-yalab performance may be followed after a short interval by another (with the same or different participants) that allows the effect of the first performance to be kept in temporal and spatial focus.

Although sa-yalab is essentially improvisatory, a limited amount of 'composition' may take place before performance in that the women are clearly aware of poetic images and place-name sequences that emerge in the texts. Memorizing does not occur with obvious regularity as a principle, although lines and images heard in sa-yalab may be 'reinvented' on a different occasion. There is no sense of a single 'authentic' version of a lament. Each performance is unique, the art of sa-yalab wailing lying in the spontaneous creation of song. Ritual wailing for the Kaluli displays the aesthetics of emotionalism, and performances are valued as expressions of personal and social identity. But the special role of women as performers of sa-yalab leads to a striking division between the sexes. Kaluli men contrast sa-yalab with their own forms of wailing, which are impulsive or wild and require the wailer to be restrained in order to regain composure, whereas women see sa-yalab as a way of articulating collective feelings.

4. THE MIDDLE EAST AND AFRICA. Lamenting has been known in the Middle East since ancient times. The most spectacular funeral ceremony in the modern world takes place among the Druzes of Lebanon (see LEBANON, §2 (iii)), an Arabic-speaking Islamic sect for whom attending a funeral is a moral obligation. The funeral performance as a whole, and dirges in particular, are referred to as nadb ('funeral songs'), a wide repertory including improvised war songs for deceased young males and wedding songs for females. Other song types used in funerals include tanāwīh (wailing songs), firaqiyyāt and scābā (departure songs), and rithā' (eulogistic poems). Nadb can be performed by men or women, but the other genres (apart from rithy', normally sung by male funeral singers specializing in ZAJAL poetry) are performed solely by women, who gather round the body of the deceased in a separate room. Female lamenters are instructed not to invoke excessive grief at funerals, not to beat themselves nor dance and sing before a male audience; all singers must avoid song texts that criticize the acceptance of death as divine justice. The melodic compass of laments is generally limited to a 4th or 5th, although rithā' songs may reach an octave or more. These scalic patterns are often related to the system of maqāmāt.

In sub-Saharan Africa a woman who leads the lament is honoured. In Zambia, for example, every woman is expected to know how to sing the lament in preparation for singing for her own relatives when they die. Older women are closer to ancestors by virtue of their age; men, on the other hand, do not sing the lament because they have never given birth. The lament gives birth to a spirit, because without death there would be no ancestors; women therefore sing the dirge to bring life. Music is the purest form of communication: through it the spirit can be called back to work with its people, or a human, purged by death, can be elevated to spirit form. Older women, then, sing the lament because they are more knowledgeable, and music is their appropriate form of communication.

Among the Ga people of south-eastern Ghana, the music and dance of transitional funeral rites are collectively termed adowa, performed at the wake the night before burial and on the day of the burial before and during the funeral procession. Adowa is the only corpus of songs and a dance used for a single rite of passage by all Ga people; the songs are performed exclusively by women. Public mourning is also conducted by women, in keeping with the belief, shared with the Asante, that weeping does not become men (who are, nevertheless, expected to express their sorrow at a death). The dirges sung can refer to such qualities as patience, family cohesion or sharing (Hampton, 1982). The elders are recognized as the principal mourners apart from the bereaved family.

The most important musical expression in funerals of the Akpafu, who also inhabit south-eastern Ghana, is the dirge sung by adult women. The Akpafu, a largely agrarian people whose culture is strongly influenced by the dominant neighbouring Ewe, have begun to include Ewe funeral dirges, worksongs and folktale interludes in their repertory. They perceive two broad categories of music for funeral rites: abi ('drums') and sino ('dirges'). Sino is semantically and functionally quite distinct from kuka ('song'), and combines singing, speaking and a manner midway between the two. Both Christian and more traditional non-Christian funeral rites are held, the former being a 20th-century development. In both types, dirges that use Western functional harmony, especially at cadence points, are heard alongside traditional dirges. In the Christian wake, hymns, Bible readings and testimonies by friends and relatives are interspersed with neo-traditional choral and brass band music and punctuated by sobs, wails, cries and shouts as expressions of sorrow. Dirges are central to the traditional wake, and may number anything from 20 to 40 over its span. The cosmology expressed in them embodies a belief that life before and after death is regulated by spirits who remain active in both stages. The singer may address questions to the deceased about the passage from this world to the next, as well as detailing his or her personal attributes.

Structurally, dirges are cast in a call–response form, and stock phrases by the lead singer are answered by a chorus restating the main musical ideas and amplifying them with wails, cries and shouts as well as verbal expressions suggested by the particular dirge. Important gaps or silences occur between the phrases of the response. The Akpafu dirge, like that of the Akan, may be characterized in performance as 'essentially a linguistic activity' (Nketia, 1955, p.113); some dirges are influenced structurally by the sound of speech patterns, while others show affinity with semantic aspects. In some a melodic phrase remains constant while elements of the text change. Each dirge can thus be considered a unique structure that highlights significant features. Melodic contour, for example, follows the intonational contour of speech quite closely. A number of dirges employ the archetypal gradual descent noted by writers on African melody, reaching the lowest pitch at or near the end. Akpafu dirge melodies can stray into other generic territory and become, for example, dance-songs, confirming that a multiplicity of subgenres are implicit in them (Agawu, 1988).

5. The Americas. In the Caribbean, funeral wakes on Jamaica and Martinique customarily occupied nine days. The East Indian influence in Trinidad has resulted in an annual ritual celebrating the martyrdom of the grandsons of the Prophet Muhammad; traditionally, women followed the procession of ornate temple-tombs singing laments. On Carriacou, between Grenada and St Vincent, the African-derived creole repertory includes hallecord songs with lamenting texts. Wakes on Guadeloupe include music performed both within and outside the house of the deceased: outdoors, throat sounds, clapping and stamping accompany the music. A male singer leads, with the exchange amounting to a competition in which singers challenge one another, begging the audience for support. Indoors, invited women singers sing canticles (kantikamo) over the coffin throughout the night, again in a responsorial fashion. Songs performed outdoors support the mourners, while those sung indoors invoke the spirit world.

Wakes on St Lucia involve singing, dancing and instrumental performance. On the first and eighth night following the death, funeral wakes are held at the house of the deceased. Hymns and sankeys (gospel hymns), as prayers to God to accept the souls of the dead into heaven, have been sung at St Lucia wakes since around 1970. An unaccompanied vocal genre, kont, includes a variety of topics chiefly concerning death but also as a means of entertainment: a good kont singer must be a convincing actor, with a clear voice and keen wit. Normally, the kont consists of two sections that involve contrast in melodic material and in the pace of alternation by solo and chorus. The song may be extended or reduced depending on its reception. To intensify expression kont singers use sustained notes, a wider ambitus and melodic leaps of up to a 12th. Some make a point of heavy breathing at the end of certain phrases as a means of indicating their emotional involvement.

African-related practices exist in Colombia: the wake for a dead child includes celebratory music as part of the belief that the child's soul goes directly to heaven. The Quichua of Ecuador employ harp music during the child's funeral; eventually, addressing her child, the mother's lament revolves around a descending major 2nd followed by a descending major 3rd (G–F–D). In the Atlantic region the wake (velorio) is usually held in the parents' home, music being provided by a specialized group of singers in call and response mode, while others sing and dance in a circle around the corpse. In the Pacific area hymns for the dead (chigualos) are sung by a chorus of women accompanied by male kin playing drums. The wake for an adult is more solemn; no drumming occurs, and all sing dirges. For the Atlantic-coast Sumu people in Nicaragua the funeral rite is the most important communal ceremony. On the first night, the shaman sings incantations to invoke the spirit of the deceased. Dancing with instrumental accompaniment continues the ritual.

The Miskitu, an Amerindian people who inhabit parts of Nicaragua, Honduras and north-eastern Costa Rica, mourn their departed in laments (inanka) sung by women which refer to the life of the deceased and idealize the afterlife. The singers weep while seated around the body of the deceased and sing laments to accompany the burial. The melodies are descending in contour, with the lowest note repeated at phrase ends. A wake for a dead child can include a greater variety of music, sometimes accompanied by a musical bow or machete, and a tiun ('song', 'tune') referring to death may be sung. Three days after the death, a shaman begins an extended wake in which laments are the principal form; the shaman dances and sings to the soul, manifested as a firefly trapped in his hands. This dance is accompanied by one or more rustic plucked lutes known as kitar (from guitar), food-grater rasps, rattles without handles, and a horse's jawbone. At the same time, younger men perform their songs to the same instruments. Portable radios and record players add to the scene in contemporary rituals. As the sky lightens, the performers move to the grave, where the shaman buries the firefly with the body.

Among northern Amerindian cultures laments take another form. L.B. Palladino observed that one of the funeral dirges sung by Flathead Indians while carrying the dead to the place of burial was an old war song, 'a stirring wail of lamentation they used to sing over their braves fallen in battle' (Indian and White in the Northwest, Baltimore, 1894, 2/1922). The arrival of missionaries marked the first time Salish learnt 'a prayer song for death'. One writer in the 1880s described a dirge to accompany a warrior funeral, but this was an arrangement by an early missionary, later adapted as a Christian hymn. H.H. Turney-High (The Flathead Indians of Montana, Menasha, Wisconsin, 1937) gave an account of a death feast: after the meal the men retired to the interior of the lodge and began the death chant, which had few words and was 'a long, protracted wail with no or few intermissions'.

Lamentations. The Old Testament verses of mourning of the prophet Jeremiah (Threni, Lamentationes), portions of which were sung in the Roman Catholic liturgy until around 1970 as lessons for the first Nocturn of Matins on Maundy Thursday, Good Friday and Holy Saturday. Along with the great responsories, the Lamentations are musically the most important texts of TENEBRAE and were set polyphonically by major composers as early as the 15th century.

1. Structure of chant. 2. Polyphonic Lamentations to 1600. 3. Settings after 1600.

TABLE 1

	Lesson I	Lesson II	Lesson III
Maundy Thursday	i. 1–5	i. 6–9	i. 10–14
Good Friday	ii. 8–11	ii. 12–15	iii. 1–9
Holy Saturday	iii. 22–30	iv. 1–6	v. 1–11

1. STRUCTURE OF CHANT. Until the 16th century the number and selection of Lamentations verses used as lessons for the triduum sacrum varied considerably, but the Council of Trent succeeded in establishing an ordered system. From then the division was essentially as shown in Table 1. The first lesson begins with the words 'Incipit lamentatio Jeremiae prophetae' (or 'De lamentatione'), the third lesson on Holy Saturday with 'Incipit oratio Jeremiae prophetae'. A distinguishing feature is the appearance of Hebrew letters (Aleph, Beth, Ghimel) at the beginning of each verse, indicating that in the original Hebrew the five chapters of laments were largely an alphabetical acrostic. Each lesson ends with the line 'Jerusalem, Jerusalem, convertere ad Dominum Deum tuum', which is not from Jeremiah but is freely adapted from Hosea xiv.1.

Like the Passion, the Lamentations received particular emphasis in the readings of the Holy Week liturgy and were distinguished by special lesson chants. Those that survive from the Middle Ages are in part simple recitation formulae and in part more individual settings that attempt to express the content of the text (ex.1). After the Council of Trent one of the simpler existing formulae, related structurally to the 6th psalm tone, was officially prescribed in the Roman liturgy (ex.2). For the Oratio Jeremiae

Ex.2 LU, 631

(third lesson on Holy Saturday) a melodically rich, ornamented tonus lamentationum of Spanish provenance could be used. A monophonic setting of the complete Sarum text by the 15th-century English composer John Tuder (GB-Cmc Pepys 1236) is an extended paraphrase of the 'Roman' tone in a form then current in England.

2. POLYPHONIC LAMENTATIONS TO 1600. The history of polyphonic Lamentations can be traced only as far back as the middle of the 15th century. Like contemporary polyphony for the Passion, the earliest settings intended to serve liturgically as lessons for the triduum sacrum were organum-like with strictly syllabic declamation and frequent parallel movement. However, such settings may be distinguished from a smaller group of motet-like works based on single verses. The best-known example is Du Fay's three-voice lament on the fall of Constantinople (1453), which has a French text ('O tres piteulx') in the upper voice and the Roman tonus lamentationum with the text 'Omnes amici ejus spreverunt eam' (Lamentations i.2) in the tenor. Other 'Lamentation motets' of the late 15th century are Johannes Cornago's Patres nostri peccaverunt and Compère's O vos omnes.

A large, two-volume collection of polyphonic Lamentations printed by Petrucci in 1506 illustrates the extent to which composers of the Josquin generation, including Alexander Agricola, Marbrianus de Orto, Johannes de Quadris, Gaspar van Weerbeke, Erasmus Lapicida, Tinctoris, Tromboncino and Bernhard Ycart, were interested in works of this genre. A characteristic of the works of this collection, and of Lamentations generally in the first half of the 16th century, is that individual composers treated a varied selection of Lamentations chapters. They also differ greatly in the number of verses they set, as well as in the way they grouped them in the course of the lesson. In melodic substance the majority of the Lamentations in Petrucci's collection bear the stamp of the Roman tonus lamentationum, which is clearly recognizable as a cantus firmus in places and more freely worked in others. The setting of Tromboncino is peculiar in that the opening is set to an original theme, the individual motifs of which are repeated in the same or a different order as the text progresses. The Lamentations of Quadris are also notable for their strophic-like form, similar in structure to settings of the Magnificat from around 1500.

The flowering of polyphonic Lamentations that began with the Petrucci edition lasted for the whole of the 16th century. Netherlandish, French, Italian and Spanish composers were first and foremost in this field, English and German being less in evidence. For the first half of the century the main sources are Liber decimus: Passiones (Paris, 1534; RISM 1535[2]); Selectae harmoniae (Wittenberg, 1538[1]); Lamentationes Hieremiae Prophetae (Nuremberg, 1549[1]); and Piissimae ac sacratissimae lamentationes (Paris, 1557[7]). These publications include Lamentations by Arcadelt, Crecquillon, Costanzo Festa, Antoine de Févin, Johannes Gardano, Isaac, La Rue, Stephan Mahu and Claudin de Sermisy. Carpentras must rank as the most prolific composer of the genre at this time; his Lamentations, which had appeared in an individual edition in Avignon in 1532, enjoyed special favour with the popes and were regularly sung in S Pietro until 1587.

Lamentations in the first half of the 16th century adhered more rigidly to the Roman tonus lamentationum than did those of earlier composers, which means that most were in the same mode (F Ionian). Stylistically they are similar to the contemporary motet; four-part writing is clearly the rule and the spectrum of contrapuntal possibilities is quite varied. The Lamentations of Carpentras and Crecquillon, in particular, are often highly imitative and rhythmically complex, whereas La Rue preferred a more homorhythmic texture reminiscent of the French chanson. Expressive devices are not more highly developed or more frequently used than in other genres despite the strongly expressive nature of the text.

In the second half of the 16th century the most significant settings are those of Morales (1564), Victoria (1581), Lassus (1585), Asola (1585), Handl (in Opus musicum, iii, 1587) and Palestrina (five books from 1564 on, only the first of which was printed in Rome in 1588). Palestrina's Lamentations, along with works of other composers, replaced those of Carpentras in the papal chapel from 1587. Stylistically they are close to his Improperia and Stabat mater and belong among his most mature works. In contrast to settings from the first half of the century, they reveal a stronger tendency to homorhythmic texture in order to obtain a clear declamation of the text (this is also true of the Lamentations of Lassus and Handl, but not of Morales and Victoria). In Palestrina's compositions only the Hebrew letters are melodically and rhythmically ornate, rather like illuminated initials. Adherence to the Roman tonus lamentationum was no longer as prevalent nor as strict; this is generally true of other settings of his time. The only complete setting of the Lamentations from 16th-century England, which appears anonymously in GB-Lbl Roy. App.12–16, does occasionally paraphrase the chant tone in the upper voice and the partial setting by Osbert Parsley makes use of it; but the Lamentations of Byrd, Tallis and Robert White dispense with it altogether. Of these English settings, only that of Tallis sets a text corresponding to the requirements of the Sarum Breviary (in this case the first and second lessons of Maundy Thursday); those of White (two sets, in five and six parts respectively, with almost identical texts) correspond to parts of the Maundy Thursday and Good Friday lessons; those of Byrd and Parsley are extracts from the Roman arrangements; while the anonymous setting includes all nine of the Roman lessons (with the omission of some verses: see Warren, 1970). 16th-century Spanish composers made striking use of a Spanish tonus lamentationum: a setting by Morales, in which this lesson tone appears as a cantus firmus, was transcribed into tablature for lute and solo voice by Miguel de Fuenllana in 1554, anticipating to some extent the early monodic Lamentations of the next century.

3. Settings after 1600. The stylistic innovations of the early 17th century influenced the Lamentations slowly. Among the numerous settings in the stile antico are those of Giovanni Croce (1603 and 1610), Karl Luython (1604), Viadana (1609) and Gregorio Allegri (1641). The Lamentations of Allegri partly superseded those of Palestrina in the papal chapel. But monodic Lamentations with basso continuo began to be written in Italy as early as the end of the 16th century. According to a report by G.B. Doni, Vincenzo Galilei of the Florentine Camerata had been moved to attempt composition by the Lamentations and by the songs of sorrow in Dante's Divina commedia, and performed his own monodic Lamentations 'molto soavemente … sopra un concerto di viole' (Trattato della musica scenica, chap.9). Any settings that Galilei may have written down, however, have not survived. The Lamentations by Cavalieri may have been written in collaboration with Galilei, but must also be seen in connection with the religious aspirations of the Congregazione dell'Oratorio. Probably performed in 1599 in the Oratorio della Vallicella in Rome, Cavalieri's setting is transitional in its alternation of parts for soloist and chorus; in this it was as characteristic of the half-century to 1650 as were the Lamentations of Annibale Gregori for solo voice and basso continuo printed in Siena in 1620. Not until the middle of the century do the sources for monodic Lamentations become more common, principally in Italy. Among those printed are works by A.B. Della Ciaia (1650), Pietro Cesi (1653), C.D. Cossoni (1668), Cazzati (1668), Francesco Cavanni (1689) and G.P. Colonna (1689); manuscripts surviving from this period include Lamentations by Carissimi, Frescobaldi, Marazzoli, G.F. Marcorelli, Carlo Rainaldi, Stradella, Gaetano Veneziano and others. The only Lamentations from Germany in this period, those of Rosenmüller, were wholly italianate in style.

The texts of these composers conform to the basic criteria of a liturgical Lesson (Hebrew letters, 'Jerusalem' line, and occasionally even traces of the Roman tonus lamentationum). Musically, however, they depart dramatically from the traditional reserve of the stile antico. The Lamentations text, with its emotionally charged contest, gave the composers of the 17th century a number of welcome opportunities for text expression (chromaticism, free use of dissonance etc.), and the pathos thus achieved, reinforced by a tendency to arioso form, brought the monodic Lamentations of this period into the immediate domain of the lamento in opera, oratorio and cantata. Interest in the setting of Lamentation texts waned noticeably in 18th-century Italy, but remained relatively high in Naples. Many representatives of the so-called Neapolitan school composed such works: Alessandro Scarlatti, Durante, Francesco Feo, Porpora, Leonardo Leo, David Perez, Jommelli, Alessandro Speranza and, in the 19th century, N.A. Zingarelli.

Apart from Italy, only France played an important part in the history of the Lamentations in the 17th and 18th centuries. There, more than 100 years after the collected edition of Lamentations of Le Roy & Ballard (1557), a new development began that culminated in the extensive leçons de ténèbres of Michel Lambert (1689) and Charpentier (*c*1670–95). The most important characteristics of these settings are a highly melismatic vocal line and the frequent use of the Roman tonus lamentationum as a melodic foundation. In fact, the leçons de ténèbres are unique, contrasting both with the French motet and with contemporary Italian Lamentations. The leçons not only served a liturgical function but were also performed in the courtly presentations of Louis XIV. The Lamentations for chorus by Guillaume Nivers (1689) were a specifically French phenomenon inspired by the exceptionally successful masses 'en plain chant' of Henry Du Mont. In the 18th century the published settings of François Couperin (?1714), Brossard (1721) and Lalande (1730) must be counted among the most noteworthy French church music of their time; their influence was felt even outside France, particularly in the Lamentations of J.-H. Fiocco, who was active in Brussels. French appreciation of the Lamentations at this time is reflected in literature, as in Diderot's reference to the Lamentations of Jommelli (Le neveu de Rameau).

For the most part, the continuing development of the Lamentations drew to a close at the end of the 18th century; not until the middle of the 20th century did the genre experience a short revival. Krenek's Lamentatio (first performed in 1958) is based on the complete text of the nine lessons and the music combines modern serial techniques with formal and stylistic devices of the late Middle Ages to produce an original choral style of great forcefulness. In contrast, Stravinsky's Threni of 1958 for soloists, chorus and orchestra is a pure 12-note work, in which the composer expressly avoided both liturgical and historical connotations.

Special cases in the history of the Lamentations are the German solo songs of the Neumarkt Cantional (*c*1480), non-biblical songs of mourning using the Hebrew letters and Jerusalem line. Finally, Haydn's Symphony no.26 ('Lamentatione') may be mentioned in this context as a unique work, one in which the Gregorian tone is used as a motif as well as a cantus firmus.

GÜNTHER MASSENKEIL

Lamento (It.: 'lament'). Usually, a vocal piece based on a mournful text, often built over a descending tetrachord ostinato (see GROUND, §2) and common in cantatas and operas of the Baroque period.

Originating in ancient Greek drama and further developed in Latin poetry, the lament topos enjoyed a privileged status in European literature. Set apart as an exceptional moment of emotional climax or particularly intense expression, it provided an occasion for special formal development and for the display of expressive rhetoric and of affective imagery. Laments were most often associated with female characters and the female voice.

Madrigals designated 'lamento' appeared occasionally during the 16th century; Stefano Rossetto's Lamento di Olimpia (1567) and B.S. Nardò's Lamento di Fiordeligi (1571), for example, each set appropriately dramatic stanzas from Ariosto's Orlando furioso. The genre assumed musical importance around the turn of the 17th century as a focus of the theoretical justifications of the new monodic style. Indeed, in defining the cathartic purpose of that style, theorists such as Giacomini, Mei and Vincenzo Galilei singled out the lament; because it expressed a height of emotional intensity, it was the type of text best calculated to move an audience to pity, thereby purging them of strong passions.

Librettists and composers of early opera acknowledged the special dramatic position and affective responsibility of the lamento, distinguishing it from the narrative flow of its context: librettists imposed greater formality through using more strongly metred and rhymed texts in which particularly affective lines often recurred as refrains; and composers interpreted these texts with greater freedom, repeating or otherwise enhancing specially affective words or phrases with melodic sequence, dissonance or textural conflicts, often imposing an overall tonal coherence to create structural self-sufficiency.

One of the most effective and clearly the most influential of early 17th-century lamenti was Monteverdi's Lamento d'Arianna from his opera to a libretto by Ottavio Rinuccini, performed in Mantua in 1608. The musical isolation of this lamento from its context was recognized immediately in contemporary descriptions of the opera's performance and confirmed by the publication of monodic Ariadne laments by Severo Bonini (1613), Possenti (1623) and F.A. Costa (1626) and, most conclusively, by Monteverdi's own reworking of the piece as a madrigal (1614), the publication of the monodic version (1623) and his adaptation of the madrigal to a sacred text (1640). His madrigal publication may well have inspired the madrigal laments of Ariadne published by Claudio Pari and Antonio Il Verso in 1619.

Monteverdi's monodic lamento, though self-contained, is not a closed form. Its organization develops out of the internal exigencies of its text: no superimposed formal structure determines its shape. It is not an aria, for arias, by definition, were fixed, predetermined musical structures and therefore inappropriate to the expression of uncontrolled passion in a lament. Clear distinctions between laments and arias persisted for some time. Claudio Saracini's second and fifth monody books (1620 and 1624) each contain one lengthy dramatic monologue entitled 'lamento', in addition to madrigals and pieces marked 'aria'. Sigismondo D'India's fourth and fifth books of Musiche (1621 and 1623), in addition to a large number of 'arias', characterized by strophic structure and simple rhythmic and melodic style, contain a total of five monodic 'lamenti in stile recitativo', highly expressive, irregular settings of lengthy dramatic texts by the composer himself. In a context in which most lamenting characters were female, portrayed by the soprano voice, three of these are notable for being scored for tenor and expressing the grief of male heroes: Orpheus, Apollo and Jason. The tradition of the extended, dramatic recitative lamento persisted until nearly the middle of the century and is exemplified in such works as Peri's Lamento d'Iole (1628), Abbatini's Pianto di Rodomonte (1633) and Rovetta's Lagrime d'Erminia (1649).

At the same time a new stage in the development of the Baroque lamento was achieved in Monteverdi's Amor, generally known as the Lamento della ninfa, published in his eighth book of madrigals (1638). The central section of a dramatic scene 'in stile recitativo', Amor is constructed over a descending tetrachord ostinato. Although probably anticipated by other tetrachord laments – including the Lamento di Madama Lucia published in 1628 under the name 'Il Fasolo' and almost certainly by Francesco Manelli – its full exploitation of the affective implications of the pattern asserted a relationship between tetrachord and lament that soon became fundamental to the genre.

In the Venetian opera repertory of the 1640s a definitive association between lament and tetrachord became explicit. Cavalli's 27 operas, the most comprehensive surviving musical documentation of Venetian opera from 1640 to 1660, confirm this association. Cavalli's earliest lamenti, like those of Monteverdi's operas, are in continuous recitative style, heightened by dissonance and affective text repetition and structured primarily by refrains. But after Apollo's lamento from Gli amori di Apollo e di Dafne (1640), partly in free recitative, partly based on the descending tetrachord, Cavalli began to employ the bass pattern consistently in lamenti, which initially occupied a specific position at the dramatic climax immediately preceding the resolution of the plot. Characterized by a slow tempo, highly accented triple metre and usually accompanied by strings, they use the tetrachord in a variety of ways, ranging from strict ostinato treatment of the simple pattern to freer treatment of one of its variants, such as a chromatic or inverted version. All these lamenti exploit the tetrachord as a source of harmonic, melodic and rhythmic dissonance created by suspensions, syncopation and overlapping phrases between the voice and the bass.

The popular success of such arias is indicated by their proliferation – accompanied by a loss of specific dramatic function – during the 1650s and 60s, to the point where some operas contain as many as four lamenti spread over their three acts (e.g. Cavalli's Statira, 1655, and Eliogabalo, 1667). Similar lamenti, many either partly or entirely based on the descending tetrachord, occur frequently in aria and cantata collections from the 1640s onwards by such composers as Benedetto Ferrari, Luigi Rossi, Carissimi and Cesti. Although a few were written for specific occasions (e.g. Rossi's Lamento della Regina di Svetia) most are settings of pastoral texts involving the amorous trials of nymphs and shepherds.

Pathetic lament arias, many of them associated with some form of the tetrachord bass, continued to occur in operas, oratorios and cantatas of the late 17th and early 18th centuries; indeed, with the development of other aria types, they tended to reassume their former specific dramatic position. Purcell's Dido and Aeneas and The Fairy Queen each contains a lament based on a chromatically descending tetrachord just before the resolution of the plot, and several Handel operas, such as Orlando (1733), contain similarly placed laments in which the tetrachord bass plays a significant role.

The term 'lamento' also appeared in conjunction with instrumental music of a programmatic nature in the late 17th and eariy 18th centuries. Froberger's Suite in C (1656) bears the title Lamento sopra la dolorosa perdita della Real Maestà di Ferdinando IV; several sets of sonatas including Biber's Mystery (or Rosary) Sonatas (*c*1676) and Kuhnau's Biblical Sonatas (1700) contain occasional 'lamento' movements; and Bach's Capriccio in B♭ (*c*1704) 'sopra la lontananza del suo fratello dilettissimo' contains an 'allgemeines Lamento der Freunde'. Although the term generally refers to the expressive musical language and dramatic intentions of these movements, in Bach's capriccio it also refers to the descending tetrachord on which the movement is based.

The persistence of an association between lament and descending tetrachord in the 19th century is attested by Jérôme-Joseph de Momigny (Cours complet d'harmonie, Paris, 1803–5). In his analysis of Mozart's Quartet in D minor K421/417b, which opens with a descending tetrachord in the bass, Momigny applied to the first violin part the text of a lament of Dido (see ANALYSIS, §II, 2).

ELLEN ROSAND

Lamm, Pavel Aleksandrovich (b Moscow, 16/28 July 1882; d Nikolina Gora, nr Moscow, 5 May 1951). Russian music editor. He graduated from the Moscow Conservatory having studied the piano and undertook concert tours with the singer Olenina d'Algeym; he was also involved with the work of the Dom pesni ('House of Song'). In 1912 he began working as a music editor, and in 1918 he was made a professor of chamber music at the Moscow Conservatory, a post he held until his death. Throughout the 1920s and 30s he also worked for the State Publishing House (Gosudarstvennnoye Izdatel'stvo).

Lamm's main scholarly contribution was his pioneering editorial methods based on a careful study of sources and precise palaeographic methods. He initiated the publication of the collected works of Musorgsky (which remained incomplete) using the autograph manuscripts and the original texts, and Lamm was one of the first music editors to account for textual variants and provide an elaborate critical apparatus. Only later did flaws in his editorial decisions emerge, such as the combination of various versions of the texts, or the grouping of the cycles. He also edited the operas of Borodin based on the composer's manuscripts, although he did not complete Knyaz Igor and the vocal score he prepared of The Warrior Heroes, which had been typeset, was never released. (Party members' indignant reaction to the 1936 production at the Chamber Theatre blocked any further progress.) Other volumes which Lamm published for the first time included the Musorgsky's piano quintet, a string trio and sextet by Borodin, the score of Rusalka by Dargomïzhsky, and the Symphony in E minor by Taneyev. Using the surviving orchestral parts and the vocal score, Lamm also restored Tchaikovsky's opera The Voyevoda, and edited for the first time several of the composer's instrumental compositions. During the 1910s and 20s, his house served as a meeting point for young composers such as Anatoly Akeksandrov, Eyges, Feinberg and Myaskovsky. Lamm acted as Prokofiev's 'artistic secretary' after the composer's return to Russia, making fair copies of his 'directions', and preparing scores of Prokofiev's orchestrations of Romeo i Dzhul'yetta, the operas Voyna i mir, Semyon Kotko and other works.

LYUDMILA KORABEL'NIKOVA

Lam Manyee [Lin Minyi] (b Hong Kong, 10 Sept 1950). Hong Kong Chinese composer, songwriter and performer. She graduated in sociology and psychology from the University of Hong Kong (1972). While working for a diploma in piano performance at the Conservatorio di S Cecilia in Rome, Lam followed a course in electronic music and began to study composition with Evangelisti (1973–6), then later with Ferneyhough at the Freiburg Hochschule für Musik (1979–82). She established a career in Hong Kong and New Jersey as a freelance composer and producer of classical and popular music. Many of Lam's compositions have a distinct philosophical flavour. In Die Meng she explores a question about existence posed by the Daoist philosopher Zhuangzi. In the similarly existentialist Is there Life on Mars? (1997), she interweaves electronic and natural sounds with snippets of speech, including quasi-scientific information, elaborately far-fetched menus and philosophical statements. Another approach to the same question is Journey (1977–8), a study in loneliness in which Lam never quite allows the instruments to interact, distancing the performers by directing them to walk about and change their relative positions. A characteristic of her work is the juxtaposition of the most unexpected of sounds, such as car horns, Bach-like melodies and counterpoint, the buzzing of electronic appliances, the suona (Chinese shawm), techno beats, the chanting of Tibetan monks, ambulance sirens and the splashing of water, to form fascinating sonic collages.

BARBARA MITTLER

La Moeulle [La Mole, La Moulaz, La Mule], Guillaume de (b Geneva, *c*1485; d Geneva, Sept 1556). Swiss composer, instrumentalist and singer. He was secretary to the last bishop of Geneva, Pierre de La Baume, and acquired a reputation as a fiddler (barbitonsor). The new republic granted him citizenship in January 1517. In 1545 he was an instrumentalist in Lyons; he may have lived there for some years before that time, for Jacques Moderne printed seven of his chansons between 1538 and 1543. On 12 October 1553, Calvin and his council appointed La Moeulle singer at St Pierre Cathedral, Geneva, in succession to Loys Bourgeois who had moved to Lyons the previous year. Despite ill health and poverty, La Moeulle set a number of psalms, canticles and chansons spirituelles for four voices. The tenor melodies were printed by Dubosc and Guéroult in 1554 (RISM 1554[18]); however those of the chansons spirituelles are identical with those by Didier Lupi published in Lyons by the Beringen brothers in 1548. In April 1555 and February 1556, the Genevan consistory reprimanded La Moeulle for playing his rebec for dancing, and rejected a petition to allow violins and other instruments to accompany psalm singing.

La Moeulle's chansons resemble the contemporary Parisian genre in their clear epigrammatic form and careful matching of textual and musical rhythm. They are, however, unusual in their use of passing chromatic harmonies, and in their unstable tonality; only one, Le mien désir, ends in the opening mode.

FRANK DOBBINS

Lamond, Frederic(k Archibald) (b Glasgow, 28 Jan 1868; d Stirling, 21 Feb 1948). Scottish pianist and composer. He was taught the rudiments of music by his brother, David. His reputation as a child prodigy spread, and in 1882 he entered the Raff Conservatory at Frankfurt, where his teachers included Max Schwarz (piano), Hugo Heermann (violin) and Anton Urspruch (composition). From 1884 he also studied with Bülow, honorary president of the Raff Conservatory, who was one of the most important influences on his musical temperament. He attended Liszt's masterclasses in Weimar and Rome between August 1885 and January 1886; having made his Berlin début on 17 November 1885 he soon appeared in Vienna and Glasgow. His reputation in Germany led him to settle there, although he travelled widely with tours to Russia, the USA (1902 and five further trips from 1922) and South America (1935).

Lamond's opposition to the Nazi regime caused him to spend an increasing amount of time in Switzerland, and at the outbreak of World War II he moved back to Britain.

Although he had success playing Brahms, Liszt and Saint-Saëns, he was most renowned as an interpreter of Beethoven. Alongside Schnabel and Backhaus, he was the foremost exponent of Beethoven's piano sonatas of the early 20th century. By modern standards his playing lacked rhythmical control, but it was impetuous and rhetorical, mixing rough grittiness with poetic eloquence. His approach to Beethoven may give us some hints of Bülow's own style. Lamond published Beethoven: Notes on the Sonatas (Glasgow, 1944) and left fragments of an autobiography, published after his death as The Memoirs of Frederic Lamond (Glasgow, 1949). His compositions include piano pieces, a piano trio, a symphony and a concert overture Scottish Highlands, all youthful works dating from the mid-1880s.

TIM PARRY

Lamoninary, Jacques-Philippe (b Maroilles, 14 July 1707; d Boulogne, 29 Oct 1802). French violinist and composer. He is first mentioned as an apprentice musician in Valenciennes in 1723. He remained there until 1779, playing the violin and composing; by 1768 he was one of the town's most affluent citizens. At various times he was engaged by the St Pierre chapel, Valenciennes; many of his compositions were performed in the chapel's richly endowed maîtrise. In 1779 he moved to Boulogne, where he gave singing and violin lessons, but died in poverty at the age of 95.

Lamoninary dedicated his compositions to his generous patron, the Marquis of Cernay. These works, which demand the fluent technique for which Lamoninary was famous, comprise 18 trio sonatas (for two violins and bass) in three sets – opp.1–2 (Paris, 1749) and op.3 (Paris, 1755) – and a set of quatuors en simphonie op.4 (Paris, ?1765–6) for string orchestra and organ. The somewhat archaic style of these pieces may reflect the taste of Lamoninary's patron; an Italian influence is also suggested. Some of the first movements have a development and recapitulation and are bithematic, while the third (final) movements are almost invariably entitled 'Minuetto amoroso'. The compositions are characterized by a diversity of thematic structures, a primarily homophonic texture and a lack of tonal variation, both within and among movements. (BrookSF; La LaurencieEF)

JEFFREY COOPER

La Monnaie, Théâtre Royal de. Opera theatre in BRUSSELS opened in 1700, also called the Koninklijke Muntschouwburg; in 1963 it became the Théâtre Royal de La Monnaie.

La Montaine, John (b Chicago, 17 March 1920). American composer. After studying privately in Chicago with Stella Robert, Muriel Parker and Margaret Farr Wilson (1935–8), he entered the Eastman School of Music, where he studied composition with Howard Hanson and Bernard Rogers (BM 1942). He also studied at the Juilliard School with Bernard Wagenaar, privately with Rudolf Ganz (1945) during service in the US Navy, and at the American Conservatory in Fontainebleau with Nadia Boulanger (1952). He has taught at the Eastman School (1964–5) and the University of Utah (1968) and served as composer-in-residence at the American Academy in Rome (1962). His honours include two Guggenheim fellowships (1959–60) and the Pulitzer Prize (1959, for the Piano Concerto, a commission from the Ford Foundation). At home in all musical genres, La Montaine's works demonstrate his deep interest in nature sounds, which he has used in such compositions as Birds of Paradise, the Mass of Nature and the Wilderness Journal. The last of these works also displays his sensitivity to text-setting. Other characteristics of his style include a predominant lyricism, and the influences of medieval music, serialism, folksong and jazz.

JAMES P. CASSARO

Lamote de Grignon (i Bocquet), Joan (b Barcelona, 7 July 1872; d Barcelona, 11 March 1949). Catalan composer, teacher and conductor. He studied at the Barcelona Conservatory with B. Tintoré, T. Güell, Gabriel Balart and later with Antoni Nicolau. He became a teacher there (1890) and was appointed its director (1917). He founded the Barcelona SO (1910), and conducted concerts with the Berlin PO (1913) and the Blüthner Orchestra (1914). In 1914 he also became conductor of the municipal band of Barcelona, in which capacity he popularized the Romantic orchestral repertory (particularly Beethoven and Richard Strauss) by means of transcriptions. Under his direction the band achieved a high level of technical proficiency and performed with great success in Berlin and Frankfurt. After the Spanish Civil War Lamote settled in Valencia and founded the Valencia Municipal Orchestra (1943), which he conducted until 1949. Lamote then returned to Barcelona where he was able to conduct one final concert before his death.

Lamote was one of the main exponents of orchestral music in Barcelona at the beginning of the 20th century. His work displays the influence of Wagner's operas, which had been performed at the Conservatory at the end of the 19th century and had made a great impression on Catalan musicians and intellectuals. Like Pedrell he adhered to nationalist trends and adopted the ideals of the political and cultural 'Renaixença' movement, introducing elements of folksong into his compositions. His vocal music and his works for orchestra and band maintained their popularity in Catalonia after his death.

His son Ricardo Lamote de Grignon y Ribas (b Barcelona, 23 Sept 1899; d Barcelona, 5 Feb 1962) was also a composer and a conductor. Among his works are an opera La cabeza del dragón (text by R. del Valle Inclán) and Enigmas for chorus and orchestra (1951) on words from the Apocalypse.

Lamothe, Ludovic (b Port-au-Prince, 22 May 1882; d Port-au-Prince, 4 April 1953). Haitian composer and pianist. He began his studies in music theory, solfège and clarinet with Robert Joseph at the Saint Louis de Gonzague Institution in Port-au-Prince and studied piano with his mother, the poet Virginie Sampeur. In 1910 he went to Paris on a scholarship to study with Louis Diémer. He returned to Haiti the following year, teaching the piano and giving frequent salon performances of his works.

Almost all Lamothe's works were written originally for piano and many of them are influenced by Caribbean dance rhythms and African-derived religious music. His best-known works in Haiti were his danzas (nos.1–4 of the Musique, an anthology of his work published in Port-au-Prince in 1955, two years after his death) and méringues lentes, both of which genres employ the five-pulse dance rhythm known as the cinquillo or quintolet. Lamothe's best-known méringue, La dangereuse, had an alternating quintolet rhythm between the right and left hand, a characteristic feature of most méringues. Lamothe was also influenced by the anthropological works of the Haitian physician and ethnologist Jean Price-Mars. He tried to incorporate ideas into his music from the Haitian religious tradition of Vodou. His works Sobo and Loco imitate rhythms from the Rada and Petwo nanchons (denominations) of Vodou respectively. Lamothe also published articles in the Haitian press on the relationship between music and Haitian national culture.

MICHAEL LARGEY

La Motta, Bill [Wilbur] b St Croix, VI, 13 Jan 1919; d St Thomas, VI, 8 Oct 1980). American composer. He was only 17 when his first composition in the popular idiom 'Heading for Home' (1936) was published and recorded for RCA. In spite of his musical interests, he trained to become an engineer at the US Merchant Marine Academy. As a student there he formed the Cadet Corps band and wrote a composition which later became the official marching song of the Academy. In 1950, after several years as an engineer at sea, he began composition study at the Juilliard School of Music. He later composed and arranged music for a small recording company in New York, formed his own band, became a member of ASCAP and made several recordings. In 1959 he returned to the Virgin Islands where he was active as an engineer, performer and composer of both classical and popular works. He founded the Westindy Music Company which published much of his music. His output includes 77 popular songs, of which 'Pig Knuckles and Rice' (1972) was the best seller, ten compositions for orchestra and/or concert band and 12 works for solo piano. A high point in his compositional career was Casals's performance of Don Pablo's Bolero, a work written on behalf of the people of the Virgin Islands to honour the famous cellist.

MARGOT LIETH-PHILIPP

Lamotte [La Motte], Antoine Houdar [Houdart, Houdard] de (b Paris, 17 Jan 1672; d Paris, 26 Dec 1731). French librettist, aesthetician, poet and dramatist. He received an education in Latin and French literature at a Jesuit school, then attended law school but never practised law. At the age of 21 he saw his first play (a comedy) fail miserably and reacted by attempting to join a monastery. Two months later he emerged, but he spent some time reading and writing religious texts before returning definitively to the theatre. He wrote nearly all his opera librettos between 1697 and 1708, as well as three brief spoken comedies and a number of cantata texts. Wishing to enter the Académie Française, he wrote a book of odes (1707), and was received by the Académie in 1710. His subsequent output includes spoken plays (four tragedies, five comedies), fables, a free translation of the Iliad with accompanying 'Discours' (which led to a long pamphlet war), other essays in literary criticism and miscellaneous non-fiction. In 1727 Rameau addressed a letter to Lamotte regarding his aesthetic goals in an unsuccessful bid for collaboration. Lamotte remained productive until his death, even though he had been blind and infirm for many years.

As a philosopher Lamotte's name is often coupled with that of his mentor, Fontenelle. Lamotte was a 'moderne' in the 'querelle des Anciens et des Modernes'. He favoured writing spoken tragedy in prose rather than alexandrines, aiming to please (by selective 'imitation of nature') rather than 'instruct', and replacing the traditional unities with unity of 'interest'. Although his aesthetic writings concentrate on spoken tragedy, many of his recommendations (for instance, that spectacle be exploited) reflect his experiences as a librettist. His cantata texts belong to the earliest flowering of the French chamber cantate. While typical of the genre in form and poetic style, nearly all are atypically based stories from the Old Testament.

His first achievement as a librettist was to invent a new genre, the opéra-ballet. (The term appeared later; Lamotte used the simple designation 'ballet'.) The characters in L'Europe galante are contemporary Europeans, not heroes of mythology or chivalric legend; only the prologue features allegorical figures. Each act ('entrée') has a separate plot and its own divertissement; the entrées are loosely connected by a common theme (stereotype images of love-making in different countries). Cahusac later characterized the separate entrées as 'piquant miniatures'. Lamotte's only other opéra-ballet, Le triomphe des Arts, returns to mythological characters; the five entrées represent architecture, poetry, music, painting and sculpture. The fifth entrée, which presents the legend of Pygmalion, is better known in Rameau's later setting than in La Barre's original.

Issé, in keeping with the conventions of the pastorale-héroïque, includes a pastoral love triangle involving a combination of a god and two mortals. There are three acts in the original version, but for the revised version of 1708 Lamotte lengthened the divertissements and superficially reorganized the structure by splitting Acts 1 and 3 into two acts each. D'Alembert later explained that Lamotte had been advised to put his three-act pastorale into five acts to give it 'the dignity of grand opera'; general critical opinion was that Lamotte might better have achieved 'dignity' by suppressing the comic subplot, which is a burlesque love intrigue for the confidants. The two pieces labelled comédie-ballet (a term used differently by Molière) have continuous plots, with the customary divertissement in each act. Le carnaval et la folie has mythological characters (and therefore the expected supernatural events), whereas those of La vénitienne are contemporary Europeans. Both pieces are light comedies.

Lamotte's first tragédie en musique, Amadis de Grèce, is based on the same chivalric romance as Quinault's Amadis de Gaule. His next five works in that genre borrow from ancient mythology. Finally, Scanderberg (begun in 1711 and completed by La Serre after Lamotte's death) is based on an episode in Turkish history. In his youth Lamotte had written a manuscript study of Quinault's librettos, and the general style of these 'tragedies' is based closely on Quinault. The most important difference, one that had far-reaching influence on the next generation of French librettists, was the increased importance of the divertissements. The plots are simple, allowing lengthy divertissements (frequently ceremonial celebrations) to become the centre of gravity for each act. Lamotte often borrowed Quinault's occasional device of introducing the divertissement by interrupting the drama at a moment of great tension; the return to the story often involves a similarly violent contrast between static celebration and high drama.

Lamotte, Franz (b ?1751; d The Hague, 7 Sept 1780). Violinist and composer, probably of Flemish origin. According to Burney, he was Flemish (although his name appears to come from the French-speaking, Walloon, part of the southern Netherlands) and received lessons on the violin from Felice Giardini in London, which is probably why he was often dubbed 'the young Englishman'. On 29 December 1766 he performed in the Burgtheater, Vienna; he so impressed the Viennese court that in 1767 he was given financial support to undertake a long concert tour. He appeared in Prague and Leipzig (where he performed with J.A. Hiller), and in 1768 in Padua and Venice. Leopold Mozart referred to a lengthy stay in Naples, but by 1769 Lamotte was performing in competition with the violinist G.M. Giornovichi in Paris. In 1770 or 1772 he returned to Vienna and joined the Hofkapelle of Empress Maria Theresa as a first violinist, though he continued to make concert tours. In 1775 he appeared at the Paris Concert Spirituel, and from 1776 gave concerts in London, including several subscription concerts with Rauzzini in 1778–9. He seems to have left London hurriedly in about 1780, probably because of criminal offences, but it remains unclear to what extent the resulting suspicions and reports of scandal are justified.

Even in his youth, Lamotte was regarded as a virtuoso of the first rank whose double stopping was particularly remarkable. In 1767 he caused a stir in Prague by performing at sight a violin concerto in F♯ or C♯ major by the Prince of Fürstenberg's secretary, Bablizeck (Choron and Fayolle claimed that he tuned his violin a semitone higher and ignored the sharps in accomplishing this feat). His bowing technique was also admired and, according to Mozart, his staccato playing was long remembered in Vienna. He composed concertos, sonatas and airs for the violin.

Lamoureux, Charles (b Bordeaux, 28 Sept 1834; d Paris, 21 Dec 1899). French conductor and violinist. The son of a café owner, he began studying the violin with Baudoin, who sent him to Paris at his own expense to enrol in Girard's class at the Conservatoire. There he took a premier prix for the violin in 1854, and studied harmony under Tolbecque, counterpoint and fugue under Leborne and composition with Chauvet. From 1850 he earned his living playing in the orchestra of the Théâtre du Gymnase, leaving it for a position at the Opéra. He also played in the orchestra for young performers recently formed by Pasdeloup and eventually joined the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. In 1860 he founded the Séances Populaires de Musique de Chambre with Colonne, Adam and Pilet; this society, whose partners changed several times, gave numerous concerts that were particularly interesting for their inclusion of new and seldom-performed works. From 1872 a quartet formed by Lamoureux with Coblain, Adam and Tolbecque gradually became a chamber orchestra, and, with the addition of singers, began to perform important works including Bach's keyboard concertos and excerpts from his cantatas and even a whole cantata, Der Streit zwischen Phöbus und Pan.

Lamoureux had travelled in England and Germany and was anxious to emulate the performances of large-scale choral works he had heard at the great festivals organized by Hiller and Costa. After his marriage, he found himself in possession of a large fortune, and when the committee of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, where he had been assistant conductor since 26 May 1872, refused his request to organize one or two performances of oratorios, Lamoureux resigned from the Société and decided to finance the performances himself. He produced Handel's Messiah in December 1873, followed by the St Matthew Passion, performed three times in March and April 1874 with such success that he founded the Société Française de l'Harmonie Sacrée (1874) and under its auspices presented Judas Maccabaeus and Alexander's Feast by Handel, Gounod's Gallia and Massenet's Eve. The Société was obliged to break off its activities owing to lack of funds, but Lamoureux had made his mark as a conductor. In 1876 he joined the Opéra-Comique, then under the direction of Carvalho, but stayed only six months, resigning after an argument during a rehearsal. In 1877 he was appointed to the Opéra, but only stayed there until December 1879, leaving for London, after a disagreement with the director Vaucorbeil over Mozart's Don Giovanni, to organize a festival of French music, which took place in 1881 and was a great success. He then submitted a memorandum demanding the restoration of the Théâtre-Lyrique and an annual subsidy of 600,000 francs to make it into an 'opéra populaire', but this project came to nothing.

It was at this point that Lamoureux decided to sign a contract with the Théâtre du Château d'Eau to give weekly symphony concerts. The Société des Nouveaux-Concerts (also called the Concerts Lamoureux) gave its first concert on 23 October 1881; it had an immediate and well-deserved success because of the high quality of the performances, whose precision and firmness, but also expressiveness, were Lamoureux trademarks. Almost at once he began the struggle to introduce the music of Wagner, which he carried on to the end of his career. He first performed single acts from Lohengrin and Tristan in concerts and then went to Bayreuth, where it seems that Wagner finally authorized him to produce Lohengrin. This he did in 1887 at the Eden-Théâtre, where he had established himself two years before. However the anti-Wagner extremists, using a border incident with Germany as a pretext, staged a street demonstration to protest against the performance, calling it an unpatriotic act. Lamoureux was intimidated and, though the government had not insisted on his doing so, gave up the venture before the second performance and was held responsible for the financial loss incurred. At least his nomination as Officier of the Légion d'Honneur was a source of some consolation at this time. He devoted himself once more to his weekly concerts and also directed the stage music at the Théâtre de l'Odéon. In 1891, the Opéra produced Lohengrin and Lamoureux was made the musical director. He was replaced by Colonne at the beginning of 1892 on the occasion of a change of management.

In 1893 Lamoureux made a tour of Russia; from 1896 he brought his orchestra to London yearly, and in May 1899 he took part with Sir Henry Wood in a festival in the Queen's Hall where the two conductors directed their respective orchestras alternately. In 1897 Lamoureux decided to give up the direction of his orchestra and chose Camille Chevillard, his son-in-law, to succeed him as permanent conductor. It was in order to give more time to the theatre that he curtailed his conducting, but his projects were not successful and he never built the French Bayreuth of his dreams. He did, however, finally succeed in producing Tristan und Isolde on 28 October 1899 at the Nouveau-Théâtre.

Lampadarios, Joannes. See KLADAS, JOANNES.

Lampadius [Lampe], Auctor (b Brunswick, *c*1500; d Halberstadt, 1559). German theorist and composer. His unusual Christian name comes from the patron saint of Brunswick. Between 1532 and 1535 he left a teaching post at Goslar to become Kantor at the Johannisschule at Lüneburg, newly opened after the Reformation, where Lossius also taught. In 1537 Lampadius's children died of the plague and he and his wife left Lüneburg. In a letter to the Lüneburg council written from Wernigerode on 27 November 1537, he still described himself as Lüneburg Kantor. Shortly afterwards he entered the service of the Count of Stolberg at Wernigerode, as schoolmaster and court chaplain. At Easter 1541 he was appointed pastor at St Martini, Halberstadt, where he remained until his death. In the winter of 1541–2 he matriculated at Leipzig University and, on 6 June 1542, he was accepted 'ad licentiam recipiendi doctoratus insignia'. In 1546, in a request for an increase in salary, he pleaded that he needed the money because the university had offered him a doctorate. In the 1550s he took an active part in the exchanges between leading Protestant theologians, including Flacius Illyricus.

Though a Kantor for only a few years, Lampadius was occupied with music throughout his life. In 1556, 19 years after becoming a pastor, he described himself, in a letter sent to a friend with a new composition ('words by Christ, music by Lampadius'), as 'musician and confessor of Christ', and stated that he would shortly be composing a mass; however, the only known musical works ascribed to him are two bicinia in Diphona amoena et florida (RISM 1549[16]), Omnis caro faenum and Te Deus aeterna faciat. Both appear as unattributed examples in his Compendium musices (the latter without text), and other examples are likely to be by Lampadius as well.

Lampadius is best known to the history of music for his Compendium musices, tam figurati quam plani cantus, ad formam dialogi (Berne, 1537, 5/1554), which he compiled while Kantor at the Johannisschule in Lüneburg. The book was intended for use in teaching schoolboys and chiefly assembled from the writings of others, although some of its material and presentation seems to be original and is of great interest. The first two sections are devoted to the substance and notation of pitch and rhythm respectively, 'cantus planus' and 'musica mensurata'; in both, Lampadius frequently referred to and drew upon the writings of Ornithoparchus (Musice active micrologus, 1517) and Rhau (Enchiridion utriusque musicae practicae, 1517). The third part, entitled 'De compositione cantus compendium', appears to be the most original. It is made up of five chapters, of which the first four present rules for chord-formation and voice-leading (the three rules in the third chapter are quoted without acknowledgement from Galliculus, Isagoge de compositione cantus, 1520), while the fifth is on two-part composition. The final section contains rules for reading Scripture.

One aspect of the third part of Lampadius's textbook that has received much attention is his remarks on the music of Josquin, a composer whom, like other Lutherans, he venerated. He presented Josquin's works in general terms as models worthy of imitation, and felicitously described their style: 'Josquin's works have many, varied and extremely expressive (argutissimas) sections (clausulationes), adorned with very appropriate imitations and canons, full of sweetness (suavitatis) ...'. The book has also attracted attention for its examples in different notational formats. The second chapter of the third part consists of eight rules for constructing four-part chords, each illustrated on a ten-line staff, which Lampadius recommended for beginners; there is then a summary example of a continuous phrase, given in two versions: on the ten-line staff and in four separate parts (see Owens, 26–9). Still more significant is Lampadius's example of open score, showing the opening of Verdelot's four-voice Sancta Maria succurre miseris. While not the earliest true score to survive (Martin Agricola printed one to show how tablature relates to mensural notation in Musica instrumentalis deudsch (1529), and there are three manuscript scores in two voices from about 1480 in the Tongeren fragments), its placement in the treatise is striking and suggestive. It occurs at the very end of the third section, immediately following Lampadius's discussion of experienced composers' working methods, in which he mentioned the use of the tabula compositoria (which has been variously interpreted) and contrasted former and more recent ways of composing. Lowinsky (1948) believed Lampadius was a reliable witness that Josquin composed in score, but this interpretation is called into question by the absence until much later of manuscript evidence for any composer's doing so. The passage has yet to be explained in convincing fashion.

Lampadius's Compendium musices is one of many school textbooks on music written in Central Europe during the 16th century, and must be understood in that context rather than that of advanced or original music theory. It remains necessary to investigate the 'very erudite' authorities Lampadius drew upon, since – especially in the important third part – only a few have been identified. It is not yet possible to say how much of his treatise is his own.

Lampe, Charles John Frederick (b ?London, ?1739; d London, 10 Sept 1767). English composer and organist. He was the son of John Frederick Lampe and the singer Isabella Young, who were married in 1738. In 1758 he succeeded his grandfather, Charles Young, as organist at All Hallows, Barking-by-the-Tower, a post which he held until his death. He may be the Lampe who played in the Covent Garden orchestra in 1760–61. In 1763 he married Ann Smith, a singer at Marylebone Gardens; from at least 1766 he lived in the Drury Lane area. His songs include the patriotic Britannia's Invitation to her Sons, to Partake of the Glory of the Intended Expedition (*c*1755), Damon & Delia or the Retreat (1759) and a collection, Six English Songs as Sung by Mr [Thomas] Lowe & Mrs Lampe Junr at Mary-bone Gardens (1764); his music is light and appealing with much use of the Scotch snap. Lampe's only other published compositions are some catches included in The Catch Club or Merry Companions . . . Selected by C.I.F. Lampe (*c*1765) and in A Second Collection of Catches (*c*1766).

ROGER FISKE/PAMELA McGAIRL

Lampe, Johann Friedrich (b Wolfenbüttel, 1744; d after 1788). German composer and singer. He was musical director of the Hamburg theatre from 1773 to 1777 and apparently stayed on as a singer. In 1788 he was a member of the court theatre at Schwedt (Pomerania). His works include symphonies (lost), songs, incidental music for the stage and Das Mädchen in Eichthale, a three-act Singspiel adapted from Bickerstaff's Love in a Village and Burgoyne's The Maid of the Oaks, first performed at the Hamburg Gänsemarkt (19 August 1776) and later in Berlin and elsewhere (score in D-Bdhm).

Lampe, John Frederick [Johann Friedrich] (b ?Brunswick, winter 1702–3; d Edinburgh, 25 July 1751). German composer and bassoonist active in Britain. Nothing is known of his life before he was admitted to the University of Helmstedt on 2 May 1718, when he was described as 'Brunsvicensis' ('from Brunswick'). He graduated in law in March 1720, moved to Hamburg soon after, and arrived in London in 1725 or 1726, when Henry Carey, later his regular librettist, described him in a poem as 'my LAMP obscure, because unknown' who 'shines in secret (now) to Friends alone'. Fame was predicted for him ('Light him but up! Let him in publick blaze, / He will delight not only but amaze'), but he did not attract much public attention until 1732–3, when he was the prime mover in a project to promote English opera at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket.

Lampe wrote three full-length serious operas 'after the Italian manner' within a year: Carey's Amelia, Britannia by Thomas Lediard (a diplomat who probably met Lampe in Hamburg) and Dione, adapted from a 'pastoral tragedy' by John Gay. Only two airs from Amelia survive, though ten from Britannia and eight from Dione exist in manuscript full score, perhaps copied as part of a later process of turning them from full-length operas to afterpieces. Although these three operas lost money, a fourth, The Opera of Operas, or Tom Thumb the Great, was a turning-point for Lampe. It was an adaptation of Fielding's burlesque The Tragedy of Tragedies, with opera and opera singers made the objects of ridicule rather than plays and actors. It has often been confused with Arne's rival afterpiece setting of the same text, put on at the Little Theatre in October 1733 in competition with a revival of Lampe's opera at Drury Lane, though there is little doubt that the 16 published songs are by Lampe. The Opera of Operas established Lampe in the theatre, and he was soon in demand: in spring 1734 he wrote incidental music for two plays, the masque Aurora's Nuptials (celebrating Princess Anne's wedding to the Prince of Orange) and, his second success, the pantomime Cupid and Psyche, or Columbine Courtezan.

The overture to Cupid and Psyche is an example of the 'medley overture', a popular genre in the early 1730s in which fragments of popular tunes were introduced, often in counterpoint or hidden in the lower parts; Lampe managed to work in tunes from Handel's Rodelinda, Giulio Cesare, Admeto, Ottone and Siroe. Although he was one of Handel's rivals as a composer, he was associated with his fellow-Saxon as a performer. He probably started to play the bassoon for Handel soon after he arrived in London, for Charles Burney wrote that Thomas Stanesby made a double bassoon for the coronation of 1727, and that Lampe 'was the person intended to perform on it; but, for want of a proper reed, or for some other cause, at present unknown, no use was made of it at that time'. The difficulties were evidently overcome by 174o, when Handel included a double bassoon part in L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato. The double bassoon used then was perhaps the one by Thomas Stanesby (ii) dated 1739, now in the National Museum, Dublin.

Nothing for sure is known of Lampe's activities between 1734 and 1737. He may merely have been busy teaching and writing his thoroughbass treatise, though so complete an absence from theatrical life suggests that he spent the time out of London. Perhaps he visited Paris, for both his treatises show an early familiarity with Rameau's concept of the 'fundamental bass'. He returned to London with The Dragon of Wantley, which was a sensation. Carey's libretto was reprinted 14 times in little more than a year, the work was taken up by other companies, and it held the stage until 1782. It is Lampe's only opera to survive complete: the concerted numbers were published in full score in 1738, and the recitatives are included in a manuscript full score of a shortened version, perhaps copied for the touring production Charles Burney saw in Chester in 1741. Carey ridiculed Italian opera in The Dragon of Wantley by transferring its artificial conventions and high-flown sentiments to a down-to-earth English folktale set in his native Yorkshire. The legend of Moore of Moore Hall and the dragon of Wantley (Wharncliffe near Rotherham) would have been familiar to his audience from the ballad printed in Thomas D'Urfey's Pills to Purge Melancholy. Lampe's music added an extra dimension to the comedy by setting Carey's inane lines to elaborate and seemingly serious music (see illustration).

With such a hit on their hands it was inevitable that Carey and Lampe would produce a sequel. Like most sequels, Margery, or A Worse Plague than the Dragon was less effective and less successful. But Lampe was now one of London's most prominent theatre musicians, a position he consolidated by marrying his leading lady, Isabella Young, in December 1738, thus becoming Thomas Arne's brother-in-law (Arne had married Isabella's sister Cecilia in 1737). Moreover, the pantomime Orpheus and Euridice, first produced at Covent Garden in February 1740, received 46 performances in that season alone, though the crowds were probably drawn more by a 17-foot clockwork snake that devoured Euridice (it moved with 'a velocity scarce credible') than by Lampe's music. In 1741, however, audiences for music in London dwindled as the public's attention was caught by the revolution in Shakespearean acting initiated by Charles Macklin and David Garrick. Lampe's The Sham Conjurer, a 'Comic-Masque of Speaking, Singing, Dancing', failed after three performances at Covent Garden in April, though its music (including a 'grand concerto' for oboes, horns, strings and continuo) was published in full score. As a result, his company tried its luck in the provinces, and he wrote nothing for the London theatres except for two works given at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket in spring 1744, one of which was described as an 'operetta', apparently the earliest use of the term.

Lampe's last opera, Pyramus and Thisbe, was produced at Covent Garden in January 1745. The text, derived in part from one set by Richard Leveridge in 1716, is an ingenious adaptation of the play-within-a-play in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream. As in The Opera of Operas, Italian opera and opera singers are the object of ridicule rather than plays or actors. The airs are once again deadpan, though the clichés of the Handelian style are parodied in typical rage and revenge numbers. Pyramus and Thisbe was taken up by provincial companies, though it did not lead to further opportunities in London, a couple of contributions to plays excepted.

About this time Lampe was drawn into the circle around John and Charles Wesley, perhaps through the influence of Priscilla Rich, the wife of the proprietor of Covent Garden. John Wesley wrote in his journal on 29 November 1745 that he 'spent an hour with Mr. Lampe, who had been a Deist for many years, till it pleased God, by An Earnest Appeal [John Wesley's pamphlet of 1743] to bring him to a better mind'. An immediate fruit of his conversion was Hymns on the Great Festivals and Other Occasions (1746), a handsomely produced volume of 24 hymns by Charles Wesley and his brother Samuel, set by Lampe in a florid style for voice and continuo. More of his devotional music probably survives anonymously in other collections produced by members of the Wesley circle, such as Thomas Butts's Harmonia sacra (London, 1767).

Lampe and his company went to Dublin in September 1748 for two seasons at the Smock Alley Theatre, where he wrote the lost serenata Damon and Anathe as well as music for revivals of two old tragedies, Oroonoko and Theodosius. He seems to have visited Belfast and Edinburgh in summer 1750, before returning to Dublin briefly in October and then settling in Edinburgh for a season at its new theatre; but he died of a fever there on 25 July

'On Loosing their Toast and Butter' and scene from Lampe's 'The Dragon of Wantley': engraving by George Bickham jr from 'The Musical Entertainer', i (1738)

1751, and was buried in Canongate churchyard. Charles Wesley commemorated his death in the hymn 'Tis done! The sov'reign will's obey'd.

As a composer Lampe displayed a consistent technical facility that was beyond the grasp of many of his colleagues working for the London theatres, and he showed skill at setting English even in his early works. He inevitably invites comparison with Handel, who is said to have admired The Dragon of Wantley. Yet his surviving operas are closer in style to Arne than Handel, perhaps because they are comedies. Apart from those occcasions when he parodied the Handelian style for comic effect, he tended to follow his brother-in-law in introducing elements of British popular song into his airs, including the Scotch snaps that proliferate in Pyramus and Thisbe. The few surviving fragments of his serious operas, notably the airs from Britannia and Dione, suggest that he was also capable of deeper things.

PETER HOLMAN

Lampe, Mrs. English soprano, wife of John Frederick Lampe. See YOUNG family, (4).

Lampens (*fl c*1425). Composer, possibly Netherlandish. His name is known only from F-Sm C.22, where a three-voice Credo is ascribed to him (f.103*v*–104*r*; Coussemaker, no.182; Welker, no.179; ed. in PMFC, xxiii/b, 1991). The setting is in void mensural notation in tempus imperfectum (?diminutum), and in minor prolation. Coussemaker's copy (B-Bc 56.286, no.41) has only the first part of the Credo, up to 'cuius regni non erit finis'. The conclusion, from 'Et in spiritum sanctum', was probably on f.108*v* of the manuscript.

Thurston Dart (RBM, viii, 1954, 122–4) suggested that Lampens might be identified with LAMBE; Strohm (The Rise of European Music 1380–1500, Cambridge, 1993, 2/1996) proposed an identification with Arnold or Hugo DE LANTINS.

LORENZ WELKER

Lampersberg, Gerhard (b Hermagor, Carinthia, 5 July 1928). Austrian composer and writer. He studied at the Vienna Musikhochschule with Joseph Marx (until 1953) and Alfred Uhl, among others. His first musical and literary compositions appeared after 1940. He has worked for Austrian Radio (1959–66) and as a freelance composer and writer. In 1962 he published a literary journal with Konrad Bayer, but it did not continue after Bayer's death. Lampersberg is the founder of the Insel Hombroich Festival.

Lampersberg's literary talent emerged alongside his musical abilities at an early age. His compositions, therefore, have been predominantly inspired by written texts, or by experiences and situations for which literary development has ultimately found musical expression. Although music seems to follow words for Lampersberg, he has not given priority to the articulated word itself, but rather to its underlying meaning. His compositions concentrate and express that meaning in aphorism, branch out in recitative, heighten the atmosphere with sound gestures, create veils of polyphony, or accentuate dramatic climaxes without relying on substantial instrumental resources. He has also made use of serial and 12-note techniques. His music does not dominate but rather accompanies, enclosing in itself both supplementation and interpretation.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Lampugnani, Giovanni Battista (i) (b Florence; fl 1690–98). Italian writer. Between 1690 and 1696 he was in Warsaw in the service of the nuncio Andrea Santa Croce, and in 1697 he was in Vienna in the same role. He was in London in 1698 as a correspondent of the Tuscan court, a post he held from 1693. He may have been related to Giovanni Battista Lampugnani (ii). Two of his drammi per musica are known: Per goder in amor ci vuol costanza (1691; music by Viviano Augustini) and the pastoral Amor vuol il giusto (1694; composer unknown). They were written for the weddings of King Jan Sobieski's children. Lampugnani also wrote two oratorio texts in the manner of Arcangelo Spagna: Il transito di San Casimiro (1695; composer unknown) and La caduta d'Aman (1697; music by Raniero Borrini).

ANNA SZWEYKOWSKA

Lampugnani, Giovanni Battista (ii) (b ?Milan, 1708; d Milan, 2 June 1788). Italian composer. He was of middle-class origin; his father Virgilio may have been a composer. In 1732 his first opera Candace was given at the Teatro Regio Ducale, Milan. During the ensuing years several of his operas were frequently performed, particularly in northern Italy, and in 1738 he was paid for the composition of a number of sacred works for the Ospedale della Pietà in Venice. In 1743 he was appointed resident composer at the King's Theatre, London; his first opera production there was Roxana (15 November 1743), a pasticcio including music by Handel. Lampugnani wrote two further operas for London in the early months of 1744, Alfonso and Alceste. He was back in Italy in 1745–6; his Semiramide was performed in June 1745 in Padua, and Il gran Tamerlano on 20 January 1746 in Milan. In the years after his return from London he travelled throughout Italy, organizing performances of his works in Milan, Venice, Florence, Reggio nell'Emilia, Turin, Piacenza and Genoa. His Siroe, re di Persia was performed in London in 1755, but it is not certain that he was present. In April 1758 his Il re pastore was staged in Milan, and in the same year he was appointed harpsichordist at the Teatro Regio Ducale there. His first comic operas date from this time. He also must have made the acquaintance of J.C. Bach and Padre Martini; Bach mentioned him in a letter to Martini written in 1759. Henceforth he became increasingly active as a teacher of singing and less as a composer: his last known opera was performed in Turin in 1769. He also wrote instrumental music, including trio sonatas, concertos and symphonies. When Mozart was in Milan to finish his Mitridate, rè di Ponto in 1770, Lampugnani helped rehearse the singers, including the prima donna Antonia Bernasconi. During the first three performances he played second harpsichord and in subsequent performances directed the orchestra himself. He continued his activity as harpsichordist, performing at the inauguration of the Regio Ducal Teatro alla Scala in August in 1778 and a year later at that of the Cannobiana; he was still harpsichordist at La Scala for the performance of Cimarosa's Il marito disperato in autumn 1786. Lampugnani was married to Vittoria Visconti and had two children: Leopoldo, an accountant (d 29 March 1799, aged 45), and Giuditta, a singer. When he died he was living in the parish of S Alessandro in Zebedia, Milan.

In spite of popular approval Lampugnani's music gained only lukewarm acclaim from 18th-century critics. He acquired a reputation for providing his arias with over-energetic orchestral accompaniments. Arteaga, in particular, accused him of giving all his attention to them; La Borde also stressed Lampugnani's development of the orchestra's role, though he did not criticize the music unfavourably. The best-considered judgment was passed by Burney. Writing about Alfonso, Burney commented on the large amount of bravura in the arias for the leading singer Monticelli, thought the work lacked dignity, but conceded nonetheless that 'there is a graceful gaiety in the melody of his quick songs, and an elegant tenderness in the slow, that resemble no other composer's works of that time'. In fact the arias of Lampugnani's early heroic operas contain many of the usual melodic formulae of the period. Not so usual, however, is the curious combination within several arias of elaborate melodic ornamentation – usual in heroic opera – on the one hand and a catchy tunefulness and a light buoyant style – suitable for comic opera – on the other.

The gay and elegant qualities that Burney noticed in Alfonso are present in Lampugnani's last extant opera, and incidentally his only surviving comic opera, Amor contadino. In this work Lampugnani minimized the comical, grotesque nature of the characters and relied on tunefulness to gain his effects. Unlike his earlier heroic operas, in which the da capo form is preferred for the arias, he here adopted a variety of different forms for his vocal items, and never used an exact da capo. The ensembles, consisting of several sections in differing time signatures and speeds, may owe something to the example of Galuppi, who during the 1750s constructed ensembles in a similar way. In Il re pastore Lampugnani respected earlier dramatic practices and set most of the arias in da capo form. The routine, conservative aspects of his style are exemplified in the modified repeat of the first section of the aria, with its absence of modulations beyond the customary move from tonic to dominant and back, and by the different (though not always contrasting) character of the second section. The composer also shows a rather limited harmonic vocabulary, relying mostly on tonic, dominant and subdominant chords. At the same time, his themes are not Classical in style, but are characterized more by their rhythms than by any well-defined melodic shape.

Lamy, Alfred Joseph (b Mirecourt, 8 Sept 1850; d Paris, 1919). French bowmaker. He learnt his craft in Mirecourt with Charles Claude Husson (i) from 1862 to 1868. He then took up a position with the firm of Gautrot at Château-Thierry, but his career was firmly established when he went to Paris to be assistant to F.N. Voirin. With exceptional gifts of hand and eye he copied every detail of his master's work, and it is difficult to tell their bows apart. He may have made certain of Voirin's bows unaided, but on Voirin's death in 1885 Lamy was employed by his widow for some years, and Voirin's brand continued in use. By 1889, when he won a gold medal at the Paris exhibition, Lamy was working on his own account, at premises at 24 rue Poissonnière. His brand-mark was A. LAMY À PARIS. He never varied from his teacher's style, with the characteristic small, elegant head and mostly round sticks, though they tend to be more yielding. The heads and frogs also follow Voirin's model but are slightly fuller. Most of his bows are ebony and silver mounted, the buttons being banded with two rings. Occasionally ivory or tortoiseshell is used for the frogs, with gold mountings and mother-of-pearl dots, which are either circled or plain. Generally Lamy's bows have a little more weight than Voirin's, a feature particularly appreciated by cellists, but their overall lightness has diminished their viability for the modern violinist. His output was quite large. His bows are highly regarded, and the value of well-preserved examples has risen constantly.

On his death, Lamy was succeeded by his son Alfred Lamy (b after 1875; d 1944). As they worked together for over two decades it is not surprising that their bows are remarkably similar; identification is further complicated by the fact that both used the same stamp, though there are a few distinguishing details: the mother-of-pearl slide in the frogs of Lamy the elder tend to be narrower than the son's; the buttons of Lamy the younger are not only slightly larger but also often silver-capped; and the ferrules on the son's bows can be narrower than those on the father's.

CHARLES BEARE, JAAK LIIVOJA-LORIUS

Lamy, Bernard (b Le Mans, bap. 29 June 1640; d Rouen, 29 Jan 1715). French philosopher, mathematician and philologist. He first studied at Le Mans at the Congrégation de l'Oratoire, an order that he later joined. After further studies in Paris and Saumur he taught grammar, rhetoric and philosophy at Vendôme and Juilly. He became a Jansenist. In 1667 he was ordained priest and later taught philosophy at Saumur and Angers. His teaching, based on the novel doctrines of Michael Baius and Descartes, became a centre of controversy. He was formally denounced in 1675 and sent to the seminary in Grenoble, where he remained until 1686. He was then recalled to the seminary of St Magloire, Paris, and in 1689 retired to Rouen, where he remained until his death. In his writings he attempted to develop a methodology to reconcile the humanistic and religious doctrines of his time with those based on the new mechanistic approach to scientific investigation, leading to a universal wisdom. His contributions to music are contained in studies devoted to biblical history, mathematics and especially rhetoric, in which he explained music as a phenomenon of language and laid an important theoretical basis for the later development of a doctrine of the passions.

ALBERT COHEN

Lanari, Alessandro (b S Marcello di Iesi, 25 Jan 1787; d Florence, 7 Oct 1852). Italian impresario. He was notably associated with the careers of Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi and Mercadante and was a pioneer of Romantic opera production. His activity sprang from the costume workshop which he set up in Florence about 1820 and ran with despotic attention to detail; it came to supply opera houses as far afield as Naples and Parma. His ability to work out impressive stage pictures and movement, noted early in his career, was later praised by Donizetti and led Verdi to entrust him with launching Macbeth. As a theatrical agent he made long-term contracts with singers, whom he paid and sought to place at a profit; his musical director Pietro Romani trained, among others, Gilbert Duprez, Giuseppina Strepponi, Giorgio Ronconi and Giulia Grisi. Though mean and exacting – qualities almost necessitated by the harsh working conditions of Italian opera – Lanari was later praised by Duprez for his flair; Grisi, it seems, fled from him because she wished to make money in Paris rather than because her contract was unfair (as sometimes stated).

As manager, Lanari probably began in Iesi. From 1819 he took on the running of opera seasons in larger Italian towns, more than he could attend to in person; he worked through partners and assistants and through a dense correspondence, some of which (in I-Fn) now affords valuable documentation of Italian operatic life. He managed many seasons at Lucca (then lavishly subsidized from gambling), Florence and Venice, and at the important Senigallia fair; he was also active in Rome, Naples and Bologna, in Milan at La Scala (through partners), and in smaller central and north Italian towns. He put on the first performances of Bellini's I Capuleti e i Montecchi (1830, Venice) and Beatrice di Tenda (1833, Venice), five of Donizetti's operas including Lucia di Lammermoor (1835, Naples), and Verdi's Attila (1846, Venice) and Macbeth (1847, Florence), as well as the first Italian performances of Rossini's Guillaume Tell (1831, Lucca), Meyerbeer's Robert le diable (1840, Florence) and Weber's Der Freischütz (1843, Florence).

His son Antonio Lanari (who is sometimes confused with him) was also an impresario, though less successful.

JOHN ROSSELLI

Lancashire sol-fa. A traditional solmization system. See FASOLA.

Lancers. A 19th-century square dance, which was a variant of the QUADRILLE with an elaborate final figure ('Grand Chain'). Even more than the quadrille, the music used for the dance was almost invariably derived from popular songs and stage works. The Lancers flourished alongside the quadrille in the last quarter of the 19th century and even outlived the latter into the early 20th century.

The name 'Lancers' was derived from the Quadrille des lanciers, which was introduced in Dublin in 1817 by the dancing-master John Duval. It consisted of the following five figures: 'La Dorset' (music by Spagnoletti); 'Lodoïska' (music by Rodolphe Kreutzer); 'La Native' ('If the heart of a man' from The Beggar's Opera); 'Les Graces' ('Pretty Maiden' from Storace's The Haunted Tower); and 'Les Lanciers' (music by Janiewicz). The Quadrille des lanciers achieved international popularity during the 1850s after being introduced to Paris by the dancing-master Laborde, but had virtually died out by 1870 except in England where it achieved new life with new sets of music as the Lancers. The five figures of the Quadrille des lanciers were known in France as 'Les Tiroirs', 'Les Lignes', 'Les Moulinets', 'Les Visites' and 'Les Lanciers', and in Germany (where the whole dance was alternatively known as 'Quadrille à la Cour') as 'La Dorset', 'La Victoire', 'Les Moulinets', 'Les Visites' and 'Les Lanciers' or 'Finale à la Cour'.

ANDREW LAMB

Lanchbery, John (Arthur) (b London, 15 May 1923). English conductor. He studied at the RAM, and became musical director of the Metropolitan Ballet (1948–50), then of Sadler's Wells Theatre Ballet (1951); from 1959–72 he was principal conductor of the Royal Ballet, touring widely throughout the world. He worked in television opera, and has composed incidental music for films, including The Turning Point (1977) and Nijinsky (1980), television and radio; his popular orchestral arrangements include the film score for The Tales of Beatrix Potter (1971). He has made new performing versions of various ballet scores, including La fille mal gardée and The Dream for the Royal Ballet, and Don Quixote, Giselle, Les sylphides and The Tales of Hoffmann for companies in Britain, Austria, Sweden and the USA. He was particularly successful with arrangements of operettas for ballet, especially The Merry Widow (1975) and Rosalinda (from Die Fledermaus, 1978). Lanchbery was music director of the Australian Ballet, 1972–7, and the American Ballet Theatre, 1978–81. His recordings include distinguished performances of the three Tchaikovsky ballets in their complete original versions (with the Philharmonia Orchestra). He was made an OBE in 1990.

NOËL GOODWIN

Lanciani, Flavio Carlo (b Rome, 1661; d Rome, 28 July 1706). Italian composer, cellist and copyist. He was presumably related to two other copyists named Lanciani: Tarquinio (fl 1675–1718) and Francesco Antonio (fl 1690–1726), who might have been his father and brother respectively. By 5 July 1685 he was named a maestro in the musicians' Congregazione di S Cecilia, so he presumably held an appointment as maestro di cappella. A libretto for his Judith (1689) has the handwritten annotation 'm[aestr]o S. M[aria] in Trastevere', and from 1703 until his death he was maestro di cappella there and at S Agostino. He seems to have begun and ended his compositional career with the first and last of his ten oratorios to Latin texts. Between 1685 and 1688 he set two opera and two oratorio texts by his future father-in-law, the playwright G.A. Lorenzani. From 1688 to February 1702 he was a 'virtuoso', 'aiutante di camera' and copyist for Cardinal Pietro Ottoboni, who commissioned him to set all or part of six operas for which the cardinal had written the texts; although two of them, Il martirio di S Eustachio and La costanza nell'amor divino, have religious subjects, they are listed below among the operas because they have three acts and were staged. Lanciani's other dramas include six oratorios in Italian, two Christmas Eve compositions for the Vatican and two secular serenatas. The score of S Dimna (1687) illustrates his grounding in mid-Baroque style: recitative and arioso passages play an important role; arias are text-centred, brief and in a variety of forms; and the accompaniment, usually for continuo alone, is sometimes augmented by two violins.

LOWELL LINDGREN

Lancie, John de (b Berkeley, CA, 26 July 1921). American oboist and teacher. After studying with Tabuteau at the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, from 1936 to 1940, his career was divided between orchestral posts (as principal oboist with the Philadelphia Orchestra and Pittsburgh SO), solo and chamber music and teaching. In 1954 he replaced Tabuteau at the Curtis Institute, and from 1977 to 1985 held the position of director of the Institute. While stationed in Germany during World War II, he met Richard Strauss and proposed that he write an oboe concerto. The result was a work which has become a standard part of the oboist's repertory. De Lancie did not play its première, although he did record it much later (1987). He was also responsible for commissioning Jean Françaix's L'horloge de Flore and Benjamin Lees's Concerto for Oboe and Small Orchestra. Many of de Lancie's pupils have been appointed to leading positions in orchestras throughout the USA.

Landa (Calvet), Fabio (b Villa Clara, 23 March 1924). Cuban composer, cellist and conductor. He studied the piano with Adolfo Odnoposoff and the cello with Ernesto Xancó at the Havana Municipal Conservatory. He also learnt to play the guitar and the clarinet. He played the cello in the Havana PO (1946–58) and the Cuban Radio and TV Orchestra (1953–9). He was also a member of two Havana quartets, the José White String Quartet and the Cuarteto de Cámara. Since 1961 he has played the cello with the National SO. In 1962 he became conductor of the Orchestra of the Teatro Nacional Lírico and of the Conjunto de Danza Moderna. He has also, since 1959, devoted much time to teaching. He gave music classes at the Universidad de Oriente in Santiago de Cuba (1959–61) and taught the cello at the Alejandro García Caturla Conservatory in Havana.

He has written a considerable quantity of incidental music, above all for the cinema and the theatre, as well as orchestral works, chamber music, choral pieces and works for solo instruments. His compositions are fundamentally in a neo-Romantic style, marked by a certain conservatism, with brief excursions into avant-garde technique. The most notable of his works are the La pequeña suite cubana (1950) and the Andante and Tema y fugado, both written in 1958. Also noteworthy is his Toccata for piano (1960), which uses elements taken from traditional Cuban music.

OLAVO ALÉN RODRIGUEZ

Landaeta, Juan José (b Caracas, 10 March 1780; d Cumaná, 16 Oct 1814). Venezuelan composer. He studied in the school of Father Sojo, who left him in his will 50 pesos, a violin and a viola. As a black man Landaeta could not be employed by the Church, which may explain his small sacred output. In 1805 he sought to establish a school for black children; he conducted the opera season in 1808, and participated in the 1810 conspiracy for independence. He died in the Cumaná massacre of 1814. The song Gloria al bravo pueblo, which became the Venezuelan national anthem, has been attributed to Lino Gallardo (*c*1770–1837), but Landaeta is now officially considered the composer. J.B. Plaza published an official edition in three versions (Caracas, 1947), and also edited a Salve regina in Archivo de Música Colonial Venezolana, xi (Montevideo, 1943). Landaeta's manuscripts, including five motets, a Spanish tonos and two songs, are in the Biblioteca Nacional in Caracas.

ALEJANDRO ENRIQUE PLANCHART

Landauer, Erich. See LEINSDORF, ERICH.

Landeghem, Jan van (b Temse, 28 Nov 1954). Belgian composer and organist. He began his musical studies at the St Niklaas Music Academy and completed them at the Brussels Conservatory (1973–93), where he obtained first prizes in several subjects, including composition, for which his teachers were André Laporte and Cabus. At the same time he studied organ with Kamiel D'Hooge at the Maastricht Conservatory (organ soloist's diploma, 1978). There followed summer courses in France, the Netherlands and England. As a solo organist he performed in many European countries and in the USA. He won a Fulbright scholarship to teach and perform at the Georgia State University and at the University of Kraków. He also plays chamber music as a member of the 'All'armi' Duo and Trio. For many years he directed the 'In dulci jubilo' boys' choir, and he has been appointed to conduct the 'Concinentes' Chamber Choir. Since 1976 he has taught harmony at the Brussels Conservatory and in 1986 was appointed director of the Bornem Academy of Music. His compositions have won several awards, including the Camille Huysmans Prize (1994) for Epitaffio, the East Flanders provincial prize for Een tent van Tamarinde (1995) and the Flanders-Quebec contemporary music prize (1995) for the String Quartet 'Silent Screams'. After trying out different styles, he finally embraced postmodernism, combining serialism with polystylism and an eclectic approach.

DIANA VON VOLBORTH-DANYS

Landi, Giuseppe (b Bologna; fl late 18th and early 19th centuries). Italian composer and double bass player. In 1792 he became a member, in 1801 a principe, of the Accademia Filarmonica in Bologna. He may be the Landi who performed in Gluck's Alceste in 1778 at the Teatro Comunale in Bologna, or the Giuseppe Landi who in 1798 was primo violino dei balli at the Teatro degl'Intrepidi in Florence. In 1791 and 1793 he conducted performances of his Sanctus Deus, sanctus fortis at S Francesco in Bologna. His sacred works are in the style of Stanislao Mattei, in which concertante elements in the style of contemporary opera are combined with older contrapuntal techniques. He is one of the last representative composers of the Italian oratorio cantata.

SIEGFRIED GMEINWIESER

Landi, Stefano (b Rome, bap. 26 Feb 1587; d Rome, 28 Oct 1639). Italian composer, singer and teacher. He bore his mother Cecilia's surname. His maternal grandfather Fabio, an antiquarian from Padua who had settled in Rome about 1550–57, was a member of the Roman Arciconfraternita del SS Crocefisso. Landi's father, Matteo Mattei, a shoemaker from Siena, died before Stefano entered the Collegio Germanico in Rome as a boy soprano on 8 May 1595. Stefano took minor orders on 28 October 1599 and began studies at the Seminario Romano on 25 February 1602, having been recommended by the Cesi (Cardinal Bartolomeo, Duke Federico and their mother). Only scattered notices in the ten years after defending his thesis in philosophy in 1607 indicate his early musical career as an adult: at the organ of S Maria in Trastevere in 1610, directing singers at the Oratorio del Crocefisso in May 1611 and serving as maestro di cappella at S Maria della Consolazione (1614–17). His first published composition, a three-voice motet, appeared in a Fabio Constantini anthology in 1616.

Three subsequent Venetian publications next place Landi in the north, where he entered the rarified world of the chamber musician. His five-voice madrigals were offered from Venice in February 1619 to his patron Marco Cornaro, Bishop of Padua. Four months later, from Padua, he dedicated the opera La morte d'Orfeo to Alessandro Mattei, a cleric in the household of Paul V (Borghese). By the following year Landi had returned to Rome, and on 1 June 1620 he dedicated his first book of solo arias to Prince Paolo Savelli, Duke of Albano and governor of the papal army in Emilia, whom he served until about 1622. Except for a fondness for expressive suspensions, the madrigals show nothing of the invention and liveliness of the solo arias, 12 of which are strophic variations; among them is the stupendous sonnet to the ruins of ancient Rome, Superbi colli for bass solo. The volume closes with a florid solo madrigal, six canzonets to be sung to a Spanish guitar, and a closing madrigal for solo bass. In the dedication to the book of polyphonic madrigals, however, Landi offered an artistic philosophy to which he remained true in his later works: 'My madrigals are born of man and represent human ideas and natural passions, but they are also a path and means to angelic concerts, which I strive to imitate as best I can; and in my other works I shall endeavour to reveal the shadow of true celestial music.'

The occasion and inspiration for the opera La morte d'Orfeo, designated a 'tragicomic pastoral' op.2, remains unknown. Its only Roman model is Agostino Agazzari's Eumelio, staged in 1606 at the Seminario Romano when Landi would have been a 19-year-old student. With his unknown librettist, however, Landi created five well-constructed musical tableaux representing events that led to Orpheus's death after his failure to regain Eurydice from hell. Orpheus is cast as a tenor, as is the shepherd who narrates the manner of his death in the style of epic recitation to a melodic formula. The five solo bass roles do not appear onstage at the same time and may have been double cast. Bacchus and Mercury, whose parts are written in alto clef, would probably have been sung by falsettists. Passages for the sopranos Calliope and Eurydice bear echoes of Monteverdi's Mantuan recitative laments, but in general Landi's recitative forgoes the madrigalian intensity of the early monodists. Strophic arias and arias in strophic variation form serve to focus on solo characters (e.g. Orpheus's opening scene consists only of a four-strophe aria in variation), while animated choral ensembles of shepherds, satyrs (both in double quartets), maenads and gods include solo, duet and trio sections. Touchingly elegiac are an echo aria for Nisa (Act 3 scene ii) and a plangently dactylic chorus of shepherds within which an unaccompanied trio of shepherds grieves (4.iv). Landi repeated this effect in an unaccompanied trio lament in Sant'Alessio. In the last act Orpheus sees Eurydice in hell yet again, but she no longer recognizes him. Utterly forlorn, he drinks the waters of Lethe, loses his mortal mould and is transformed into a celestial demigod, in much the same way that Alexis will become a saint in Landi's later opera (see illustration).

Landi's career in these and subsequent years appears to have been connected to the cardinal nephews of three successive popes and a cardinal prince of Savoy. On 19 December 1619 he sent a 'compositione allegra' for three voices from Ancona to Cardinal Scipione Borghese. As archpriest of S Pietro, Borghese would have recommended Landi's lifelong benefice there. When it was bestowed on 27 October 1622 by Gregory XV (Ludovisi), Landi was noted as 'servitore' of Cardinal Ludovico Ludovisi (Tallián, 280). Under Urban VIII (Barberini), Landi became a beneficed cleric of the basilica (1624–39) and 'rector and perpetual chaplain' of its chapel of SS Processus and Martianus. To his clerical duties at S Pietro Landi added service as maestro di cappella at S Maria ai Monti in Rome from the end of 1624. His cousin Fabio studied with him and became a harpist at the Medici court. His pupil Angelo Ferrotti joined the Roman household of Cardinal Maurizio of Savoy, to whom Landi dedicated his Vespers psalms and Magnificat of 1624; he sent Ferrotti to Turin to sing his second book of solo arias (1627) to its dedicatee, Maurizio's sister-in-law. Most of its airs are pleasant strophic songs; all, even the sonnet setting, have alfabeto tablature for guitar accompaniment, in addition to the usual continuo bass line. Pitoni cited two further volumes of chamber music from this period,

Final scene from Stefano Landi's 'Il Sant'Alessio' in the revival at the Palazzo Barberini alle Quattro Fontane, Rome, 1634: engraving by François Collignon after a set design variously ascribed to Pietro da Cortona, Francesco Buonamici and Gianlorenzo Bernini; Religion (centre) delivers a eulogy, while the heavenly host praises Alexis's life and the Virtues dance in celebration

Poesie diverse (1628) and a fourth book of solo arias (1629); both are lost. After his ordination as a subdeacon (5 March 1629), Landi entered the Cappella Sistina as a contralto on 29 November 1629 and moved into the Barberini inner circles, though he maintained a connection to Maurizio until 1636. Ferrotti became 'the castrato' of Cardinal Francesco, and Landi began training Girolamo Zampetti for Barberini, along with his other boarding pupils. The Barberini account books disclose payments to Landi for instructing various boys and for other musical services.

A detailed chronicle of the last ten years of Landi's life would reveal the demands made on a musician with clerical obligations and musical responsibilities in church and chamber. In addition to the liturgical and non-liturgical duties associated with the Cappella Sistina, Landi organized, directed and often composed music for festal performances at the titular churches of Cardinals Francesco and Antonio Barberini. Traces of this music survive only in a mass for the marriage of Taddeo and Anna Barberini in 1627, another in the archive of S Maria in Trastevere, and a lost book of masses. Landi attempted a revision of the plainchant responsories for Tenebrae in 1631 (formally rejected by the Sistine singers in 1633) and was on the Sistine committee to revise Palestrina's settings of the Office hymns in 1634, presumably the revision published in Antwerp in 1644. A large portrait of Palestrina hung in his house, and the two surviving masses are in the stile antico, markedly contrasting with the more modern style of his earlier psalm settings. Landi returned to the style of the 1624 works, however, in the choruses to the opera Sant'Alessio.

Francesco Barberini appears to have first planned and staged a musical version of the life of the early Christian saint Alexis in 1631. He had attended two operas on sacred subjects in Florence in 1624 and 1625, one on the life of St Ursula and the other on Judith and Holofernes (texts by Andrea Salvadori, music by Marco da Gagliano). In Rome, Cardinal Maurizio of Savoy had regularly presented dramatic entertainments in music in which Ferrotti must have sung; one of them may have been a lost S Eustachio (1625). For Carnival 1632, the Barberini offered two musical dramas by the prelate Giulio Rospigliosi. Prince Taddeo Barberini staged the Old Testament story of Queen Esther at his Palazzo ai Giubbonari, and at the new Palazzo Barberini alle Quattro Fontane Cardinal Francesco presented Landi's setting of Sant'Alessio.

Its large number of soprano roles (seven out of 11) reflects the Barberinis' access to the Sistine choir and to Landi's pupils, past and present. Years after abandoning his new bride and patrician parents, Alexis returns to Rome as a Christian ascetic. The Devil tempts him to resume the life of a Roman aristocrat, but Alexis chooses to die a mendicant under the stairs in his father's palace. There is little action; rather the main scenes focus on the family's hopes of finding their long-lost son and husband, and on Alexis's wrestling with a decision either to reveal his identity or to continue his selfless life of Christian poverty. In the last act his family grieves at discovering him only at his death and finds consolation in his holiness. Landi handled the intense dialogues with a transparent recitative style that emphasizes poignancy rather than pathos. Psychological tension is dispelled in the extended choral finales, with their metric rhythms and alternations of solo ensembles with tutti sections. The ariettas are few and brief; those who praised the castratos who played Alexis and his wife (probably Angelo Ferrotti in the title role and Marc'Antonio Pasqualini), were responding to their expressive abilities in all aspects of the new medium. The Barberini gave this private entertainment in honour of a diplomat from the Habsburg empire, Hans Ulrich, Prince of Eggenberg, sojourning in Rome with his son. Six years later Landi dedicated his sixth book of arias to the younger Eggenberg (by then Duke of Krumau) in anticipation of his return to Rome in November 1638.

Later in 1632 Francesco succeeded Cardinal Ludovisi as vice-chancellor of the church, an event which he celebrated at the titular church of S Lorenzo in Damaso by commissioning an elaborate Quarant'ore apparatus for Lent 1633, in which Landi directed the musical component. The elaborate architectural set for the host was by Pietro da Cortona, who had designed the sets for Sant'Alessio. Also in 1633 Cardinal Francesco succeeded Scipione Borghese as archpriest of S Pietro, and Landi became a deacon (Panofsky-Sorgel, 114).

Sant'Alessio was revived for Carnival 1634, its performances dedicated this time to a Polish prince, Alexander Charles of the royal house of Wasa. Minor roles were added, as were new scenes that took advantage of the sets used in Taddeo Barberini's 1633 opera, Erminia sul Giordano (music by Michelangelo Rossi). A second pageboy was added (which suggests that the insouciant duet sung by the two children, 'Poca voglio di far bene', was newly composed), as was the comic scene in which the Devil transforms himself into a bear to frighten a page away. Because the Wasa dynasty was divided between a Protestant branch ruling in Sweden and a Catholic branch in Poland, several references to the strength of Polish Catholicism were also introduced. Six slaves new in the prologue praised Alexander and were freed from bondage by the figure of Rome. In Act 2 the new figure of Religion sang a recitative and an aria in galliard rhythm which returns in the choral finale to Act 3. Although Religion's appearance marks Alexis's decision 'to follow the sun' (a Barberini emblem) and not the shadow promised by the forces of darkness, Act 3 still offers strongly contrasting emotions. In scene i an angry devil and his demons are vanquished as the floor of the stage suddenly opens to engulf them in flames. In scene iii, Alexis's wife, mother and father reach their deepest grief, expressed in an unaccompanied trio whose three sections are separated by recitative dialogue. In D minor, it never cadences in the tonic, which arrives only when a choir of consoling angels calls on them to cease their weeping at the opening of the next scene. This is only one example of Landi's many subtle means of constructing his scenes. In the finale three violins, lutes, theorbos and harps join the angels in their heavenly cloud, as dancing Virtues and a final polychoral ensemble declare Rome happy to see heaven receive its newest saint (see illustration). Landi's score, the first of three Barberini operas to be published, was issued in the same year with eight scenographic plates (see also OPERA, fig.33). Landi's note to the reader concerning transposition of roles, instrumental doubling, and ornamentation suggests that he anticipated future performances. Librettos from Reggio nell'Emilia (1645) and Bologna (1647) have survived.

The composer of the Barberini opera given in 1635 and 1636, I Santi Didimo e Theodora, is not known. Landi has been considered, since he, along with other Sistine singers, was involved in the performance, although in an unspecified capacity. He was also involved, however, as musical director for an unknown drama staged by Pietro della Valle that year. In spring 1635 he collaborated with Ottaviano Castelli to provide choral music for a May Day celebration at the pope's summer villa at Castel Gandolfo. The extant text of I pregi di primavera may not represent a unified work, but rather incidental music for a more extended festa.

Some time in 1635 Landi's health may have begun to decline; Virgilio Mazzocchi, maestro of the Cappella Giulia, replaced him as teacher of Francesco's putti and organizer of Francesco's special music, with commissions both secular and sacred from as early as April 1635. Mazzocchi was one of the composers for the 1637 Barberini opera, Chi soffre speri. The Sistine diaries for 1637 document Landi's absences to take purges and sweats for his 'mal di testa'. He seems to have occupied himself in collecting his scattered compositions, issuing a fifth book of solo arias in November 1637, a sixth in May 1638, a seventh 12 months later, and an eighth book (for two voices) in August 1639, as well as publishing his first book of a cappella masses (1638–9). Books 7 and 8 of the arias are lost, but some of the manuscript duets in the Biblioteca Universitaria Alessandrina may have originally appeared in his last publication. His illness gives a personal touch to his Latin poem on Urban VIII's restoration to good health, which was widely mentioned in carnival events of 1638 (I-Rvat, ed. in Leopold, 76). Landi made his last will on 26 October 1639, two days before his death. He was the first to be buried in the common tomb for Sistine singers in the Chiesa Nuova, the church of the Oratorians. In addition to many well-used musical instruments, the inventory of his estate listed a great deal of manuscript and printed music (see Panofsky-Sorgel).

MARGARET MURATA

Landini, Francesco [Landino, Franciscus; Magister Franciscus de Florentia; Magister Franciscus Coecus Horghanista de Florentia; Francesco degli orghani; Cechus de Florentia] (b ? Fiesole or Florence, *c*1325; d Florence, 2 Sept 1397). Italian composer, poet, organist, singer and instrument maker of the second generation of Italian Trecento composers.

1. Life. 2. Survival of works. 3. Musical style. 4. Poetry.

1. Life. Only a few dates relating to Landini's life can be established with any certainty. There is no record of his date of birth, which Fétis gave as *c*1325 and Pirrotta as *c*1335. Fiesole was stated as his place of birth, but by only one authority: the Florentine humanist Cristoforo Landino (1429–98), Landini's great-nephew, in his Elogia de suis maioribus. Most of the available biographical information derives from Filippo Villani's Liber de origine civitatis Florentiae et eiusdem famosis civibus: the chapter that concerns certain of the Trecento composers (Bartholus, Giovanni, Lorenzo and Jacopo) was written after 1381 but still within Landini's lifetime (see Villani, Filippo). The name Landini (Landino), according to Pirrotta, descends from Francesco's grandfather, Landino di Manno, who can be traced in Pratovecchio (Casentino) from 1289 onwards. However that may be, Francesco's name is nowhere specified as 'Landini' in musical manuscripts.

Francesco Landini was the son of the painter Jacopo del Casentino (?1310–1349), who was one of the school of Giotto and a co-founder of the Florentine guild of painters (in 1339). Francesco lost his sight in childhood during an attack of smallpox. As a result, he turned to music early in life. He mastered several instruments in addition to the organ; he also sang and wrote poetry. In addition he worked as organ builder, organ tuner and instrument maker. According to Villani, he is supposed to have devised a string instrument called 'syrenam'. As well as this Villani's chronicle, and also Cristoforo Landino's Dante commentary, among other sources, mention Francesco's concern with philosophical, ethical and astrological matters. He wrote an extended poem in praise of William of Ockham's logic (I-Fr 688, on which see Wesselofsky, Lanza, and Long, 1983). With this, and the verses 'in contumeliam Florentinae juventutis effeminatae', referred to by Villani, Landini took issue in the political and religious strife of his day. In view of all this, it is quite likely that several of the texts he set to music were in fact his own (see Taucci, p.152). Villani reported the crowning of the poet-musician with the 'corona laurea' by the King of Cyprus (who was in Venice in 1362–3, 1364–5 and 1368). Doubts have been cast upon this event by E. Li Gotti. Nonetheless, it is highly probable that the composer spent at least some time in northern Italy before 1370, presumably in Venice itself. Evidence for this comes not only from the transmission of many of his works in north Italian sources, but perhaps also from a single surviving voice of a motet Principum nobilissime, in which the author described himself as 'Franciscus peregre canentem' (that is, as Plamenac has explained, 'Franciscus singing abroad', i.e. far from his own country). This piece is addressed to the Doge of Venice, Andrea Contarini (doge from 1368 to 1382). It is possible, too, that a motet Marce Marcum imitaris addressed to Marco Corner (doge from 1365 to 1368), may be by Landini. There is, at least, nothing to rule out the possibility that this work, which perhaps owes something to the three-part madrigal style of Jacopo da Bologna, is an early work of Francesco's, despite the objections that Ursula Günther has raised. Further possible associations of the composer with northern Italy are the name Anna, hidden in the text as a so-called Senhal, in the madrigal Non a Narcisso (cf also madrigals by Giovanni, Jacopo and Piero), and the possibility that the madrigal Una colomba candida was written for the marriage of Gian Galeazzo Visconti and Caterina Visconti (1380).

Research by D'Accone and by Gallo has produced evidence of Landini as organist at the monastery of Santa Trinità in 1361, and as cappellanus at the church of S Lorenzo from 1365 until his death; Lorenzo da Firenze was also employed there at that time. That Landini was on good terms with the Florentine chancellor of state and humanist Coluccio Salutati is indicated by a letter of recommendation for Landini addressed to the Bishop of Florence and dated 10 September 1375. Also, in the late 1370s there is a clear and strong association between Landini and the composer ANDREAS DE FLORENTIA. In 1379 Landini was involved in the building of the new organ in the church of the SS Annunziata, where he is also known to have been organ tuner. In the same year he received a payment from Andreas 'pro quinque motectis'; whether the motets composed for the Venetian Doges were among these is impossible to establish. In 1387 Landini was involved in planning the new organ for Florence Cathedral. A vivid portrayal of his activities in Florentine society was painted by Giovanni da Prato in his narrative poetic account of Florence in 1389, Il paradiso degli Alberti (books iii and iv; see Wesselofsky; also ed. A. Lanza, Rome, 1975, and F. Garilli, Palermo, 1976). The poet-composer emerges there as singer and organetto player, and takes part in erudite conversations and discussions of philosophical and political matters.

Landini died in Florence on 2 September 1397, and was buried there on 4 September in the church of S Lorenzo. His tombstone, which was discovered in Prato in the 19th century, and which is now back in S Lorenzo (in the second side-chapel to the right), shows the blind composer with his organetto. A similar depiction is to be found on f.121*v* of the Squarcialupi Codex (I-Fl 87), in which Landini is depicted with the 'corona laurea' referred to by Villani (see illustration).

In addition to the praise of Salutati in 1375, and that of Villani and Giovanni da Prato, the composer's fame was proclaimed by Franco Sacchetti, Cino Rinuccini (1397) and Cristoforo Landino (1446), among others. Landini's name does not occur again until 1589; it was cited by Michael Poccianti (Catalogus scriptorum Florentiae), and taken up by Walther in 1732 and A.M. Bandini in 1748. As a composer he was rediscovered by Fétis (Revue musicale, i, 1827).

2. SURVIVAL OF WORKS. 154 works can be attributed with certainty to Landini: 89 ballatas for two voices, 42 for three voices, and at least nine which survive in both two-part and three-part versions (though in three of these cases the contratenor is probably not by Landini); one

Francesco Landini wearing the 'corona laurea' and playing the organetto: miniature from the Squarcialupi Codex, 15th century (I-Fl Med.Pal.87, f.121v)

French virelai; one caccia; nine madrigals for two voices, and three for three voices (of which one is canonic, one is a triple madrigal and one is isorhythmic in structure). To these must be added (as works of doubtful authenticity) two ballatas for two voices (the ballata Mort' è la fè with erased ascription in F-Pn 568 is by Paolo da Firanze, see J. Nādas/A-Ziino, 1990); and four motets, of which three survive only as fragmentary single voices. The music for at least one further text by Sacchetti is lost. Landini's extant works represent about a quarter of the entire known repertory of secular music from the Trecento.

The manuscripts of Landini's music are confined exclusively to Italy and, in one case, southern Germany (CZ-Pu XI E 9). The source that is central to Landini's work, and with which he was probably directly concerned, is I-Fn 26 (presumed to have been copied 1380–88). Numerically speaking, the largest collection of Landini's works – 145 pieces – is the Squarcialupi Manuscript (see SOURCES, MS, §VIII, 2). Three works are known in instrumental versions from the early 15th century. There are sacred contrafacta in two south German sources. In addition, at least 19 ballata texts known through Landini's settings were poetically recast as laude spirituali. To what extent the music of the prototypes was retained for these recast poems, or indeed whether it was retained at all, we cannot be sure. With a syllabic piece such as Ecco la primavera, the use of the same music for the lauda version, Preghian Gesù con lieta cera, is quite conceivable throughout. To do the same thing for a melismatic piece such as Donna, s'i' t'ò fallito in its lauda version Donna, s'i' son partito da Cristo is more questionable. The ballata Questa fanciulla must have been particularly popular, for it survives in at least six different forms: the original ballata, an instrumental intabulation, and four contrafacta (a Kyrie, an Agnus, an Est illa and a lauda, Creata fusti, o Vergine Maria). Moreover, Oswald von Wolkenstein used the piece for his lied Mein hertz das ist versert (see Göllner). At least seven works by Landini are cited in Prudenzani's Saporetto (Orvieto, *c*1415), and one in a treatise by Anonymus 5 (CoussemakerS, iii, pp.395–6).

The notation of Landini's works exhibits certain French scribal practices which were of increasing importance in Italy towards the end of the 14th century. This is particularly evident in cases where a piece was apparently originally composed in divisio duodenaria or octonaria but has been written down in augmented form, in modus perfectus or imperfectus (the so-called 'Longanotation', on which see Fischer, 1959; Fellin; N. Pirrotta: Introduction to CMM, viii, vols.1, 3 and 4, 1954–63).

3. Musical style. Landini's style has many facets. It ranges from the simple dance-song to the highly stylized piece with canonic or isorhythmic structure. It stretches from the Italian style of his precursors Jacopo and Lorenzo, across the infiltration of French influences, to an ultimate synthesis of French and Italian elements of style. Most immediate in its impression is Landini's gift for melody – distinctively shaped and at the same time expressive. At phrase-ends the under-3rd cadence (the so-called Landini cadence) figures frequently in the upper voices (ex.1).

Ex.1 Ballata, Gram piant'agli ochi

Little can be said with certainty about the development of Landini's style. The texts offer very scanty clues on which to date works. Schrade's belief that the order of the pieces as written in I-Fn 26 reflects a roughly chronological order is questionable. Some precision of dating arises from the known dates of three ballata texts by Sacchetti. The pieces in question are Non creder, donna (1368–70), Perché virtù (1374) and Altri n'avrà (after 1384); we may assume that their musical setting followed in each case not too long after the writing of the poems. The ballata Or su, gentili spirti, referred to in Il Paradiso degli Alberti, was presumably a newly composed work of Landini's at the time when the story is set (1389). Furthermore, three pieces that seem to express similar 'philosophical' tenets – Tu che l'opera altrui, Contemplar le gran cose and Deh, dimmi tu – are likely to date from about 1380, though the case for connecting them to Ockhamism is perhaps too weak. The madrigal Per la'nfluenza di Saturno e Marte perhaps centres on a historical event: but whether its subject is the events of the 1370s or those of the late 1360s remains an open question. The madrigals Musica son and Mostrommi Amor are to be construed autobiographically, and perhaps also the two ballate I' fu' tuo servo, Amore and I' piango, lasso.

Ex.2 Madrigal, Non an Narcisso

On the basis of known datings, and of considerations of style, the following picture emerges of the separate categories of composition.

The two-voice madrigals, which accord with the older Trecento practice in always setting text to both voices, in placing melismas on the initial and penultimate syllables of the line, in cadencing at the unison rather than at the octave, and in effecting a change of mensuration in the ritornello, follow the models of Giovanni da Cascia, Jacopo da Bologna and others. Despite this, they are not all to be assigned to the composer's youth. The criteria for early date of composition seem to be: parallel open 5ths (a pointer to the connection of madrigal style with the earlier style of organum), simultaneous declamation of syllables, and untexted linking phrases, for one voice alone, between individual lines of verse (as inex.2)), on the model of Jacopo.

Ex.3 Ballata, Guard'una volta

As his style developed, these linking phrases came to be texted. At corresponding points in the later works imitative entries become a regular feature (see for example Mostrommi Amor, which is also his only madrigal written in senaria imperfecta). There also seems to have been, during the course of Landini's stylistic development, a growing tendency towards a certain tonal cohesion. Non a Narcisso, for example, an early work, has its stanza beginning on E and ending on A, and the ritornello ending on C; the ends of the lines cadence on C, G, A, D and C. Una colomba candida (?1380, but date rejected by Long, 1987, on stylistic grounds), on the other hand, has its stanza beginning and ending on G, the ritornello ending on C, the lines cadencing on A, G, G, A, C.

The three-voice madrigals exhibit a fusion of Italian and French techniques of composition. Musica son is a triple-texted madrigal, perhaps modelled on Jacopo da Bologna's Aquila altera. Sì dolce non sonò is constructed isorhythmically (see Fischer, 1975). Deh, dimmi tu is canonic in structure. His only caccia, Cosi pensoso, is, judging from its style (for instance, use of dissonance and of identical cadences at the end of the two sections), an early work possibly composed in northern Italy.

In the realm of the polyphonic ballata, a form that was scarcely to be found in Florence before the 1360s, Landini appears to have been a pioneer. Of his 89 two-voice ballatas, no fewer than 82 follow the pattern of the madrigal in having text for both voices. With four exceptions, these pieces lack the first-and second-time endings with two piedi (ouvert–clos, or verto–chiuso) so characteristic of the French virelai (the French form corresponding to the ballata). Moreover, among the ballatas with text in both voices, the majority have predominantly Italian mensurations (duodenaria, octonaria, senaria perfecta – admittedly in most cases converted into French notation). All of this points to a rather early date of composition, at least for a proportion of the two-voice ballatas. It may be presumed that the French influence, found in the pieces with untexted tenors, is a feature of later works. Five of these ballatas display the ouvert–clos in the French manner (invariably cadencing on D, E, D), and six have 'French-orientated' mensurations (senaria imperfecta and novenaria) and often use syncopation; in only three cases (Abbonda di virtù, Ognor mi trovo, Vaga fanciulla) does the concluding phrase of the piedi mirror musically that of the ripresa. The placing of melismas on the first and penultimate syllables of a line is a common feature taken over from the madrigal. In contrast to the madrigal, on the other hand, individual lines of verse are separated by rests instead of by linking phrases, and the two sections (ripresa/volta and piedi) are not rhythmically differentiated. Also the ballatas show a generally stronger tonal cohesion than do the madrigals; approximately half of the two-voice ballatas begin and end on the same pitch (in some 35 other cases only the first and last chords of the ripresa are the same). (For illustration see SOURCES, MS, fig.36.)

The influence of the French chanson style is more apparent in the three-voice ballatas. It is detectable in the 18 pieces that are universally transmitted with text in the superius only (seven more have the superius and tenor texted, a pattern that made its first appearance in the works of Landini; six have all voices texted, in the Italian manner). 12 of these 18 works are in French mensurations (eight in 6/8 and four in 9/8). Verto and chiuso endings occur in 31 pieces (often cadencing on D, E, D), including all the pieces with text in the superius alone; whereas this double ending is hardly ever found among the works with text in all voices and in those with two parts texted. French influence can also be suspected wherever in place of smooth flowing lines and small regularly sequential passages the melodic style gives way to much tinier motifs and more frequent syncopations. Similarly, the greater amount of melodic parallelism at the ends of ripresa and strofa to be found in the three-voice ballatas (e.g. Lasso! di donna, Questa fanciulla and others) is to be put down to French influence. Two double endings, one for the ripresa and one for the strofa, are a feature of the ballatas Partesi con dolore and Conviensi a fede.

Given this evidence, it follows that the three-voice ballatas must belong primarily to the middle or later period of Landini's career. The unified tonality of these works points to the same conclusion. About half of them begin and end the ripresa on the same pitch; moreover, in 14 cases the strofa ends on the same pitch as the ripresa. Tonal orientation is also provided by the commonly-used interval of a 5th between the opening and the closing chords (at points where Landini always used sonorities composed of perfect consonances; see Schachter).

Particularly revealing for Landini's style is his treatment of the contratenor. In about half of the three-voice ballatas there is – in contrast to French practice – no crossing of parts between tenor and contratenor. In 20 cases, even the contratenor moves in the same range as the superius. As in the three-voice madrigals of Jacopo and Lorenzo,

Ex.4 Ballata, Amor c'al tuo sugetto and in a manner reminiscent of the caccia, the contratenor in such cases functions as a secundus cantus, as in ex.3.

The remaining three-voice ballatas do have, in French fashion, crossing of parts between tenor and contratenor. Above them the superius voice moves mostly in shorter note values (ex.4).

Ex.5 Ballata, Partesi con dolore

One type of composition, possibly created by Landini, and cultivated in particular by Paolo da Firenze, is a mixed Italian–French type (found only in Italy) in which the superius and tenor are texted while the contratenor forms an untexted middle voice. One or two of the three-voice ballatas (such as Amar sì li alti and Partesi con dolore), pieces which can be considered late works, have a distinctly melodic top voice, and underlying harmonies that occasionally come close to fauxbourdon, as in ex.5.

If one were to apply a hypothetical scheme of dating to the various facets of style within Landini's work, a pattern such as the following would emerge: up to *c*1370 (including the earliest ballatas), assimilation of the older Trecento style; *c*1370–80/85, French influence, notably upon the three-voice ballatas; *c*1385–97, a synthesis of Italian and French features, and an increase of vertical harmonic effect. In these late works Landini pointed towards the music of the 15th century.

4. POETRY. With the exception of the verses about William of Ockham mentioned above and two further moralizing poems in Latin and Italian attributed to the composer in the same manuscript, a sonnet written in reply to Franco Sacchetti, and two ballatas explicitly attributed in a literary source (I-Rvat Chigi L.IV.131), there is scarcely a poem to which Landini's authorship can be securely attached. Nonetheless, the texts of the clearly autobiographical pieces at least presumably come from him, and some of the ballatas named by Taucci, too. These, along with the texts that he set by Sacchetti, Cino Rinuccini and Bindo d'Alesso Donati, belong to the Italian tradition of the late stil novo, but they also reflect the typically Florentine taste for bourgeois poetry (as witnessed by the senhals).

KURT VON FISCHER/GIANLUCA D'AGOSTINO

Landini, Giovanni Battista (fl 1630–35). Florentine music printer. He appears to have taken over the firm of PIETRO CECCONCELLI.

Landini cadence [Landino 6th] (Ger. Landinoklausel, Landinosext). A name often used for a cadential formula in which the sixth degree of the scale is interposed between the leading note and its resolution on the tonic or final degree (ex.1). Many examples appear in the ballate of Francesco Landini (ex.2 and 3, but it is particularly common in polyphony of the 15th and early 16th centuries.

Ex.1

The pattern is perhaps inevitable because contrapuntal theory of the Middle Ages required that a cadence should include two voices moving outwards to an octave (or perhaps a 5th), and composers were driven to add variety

Ex.2

Ex.3

by embellishing the progression: several different kinds of embellishment pattern can be found in the music of that time, most of them giving prominence to the sixth degree which had the advantage of giving a perfect 5th with the lower voice in all such cadences. Exx.4, 5 and 6 show the three most common types of the cadence, all taken from the songs of Binchois.

Ex.4

Ex.5

Ex.6

In general the term has been used with extreme caution in scholarly writing: it is normal to put it in quotes, to qualify it as 'the so-called Landini cadence', or to find a synonym such as 'under-third cadence'. But the name, though it has no medieval authority, may not be entirely inappropriate: certainly the figure appears earlier in the monophonic ballate of Gherardello da Firenze, for example; but Landini seems to have been the first composer to use the pattern at all systematically in the manner described above (see M. Long: 'Landini's Musical Patrimony: a Reassessment of some Compositional Conventions in Trecento Polyphony', JAMS, xl (1987), 31–52).

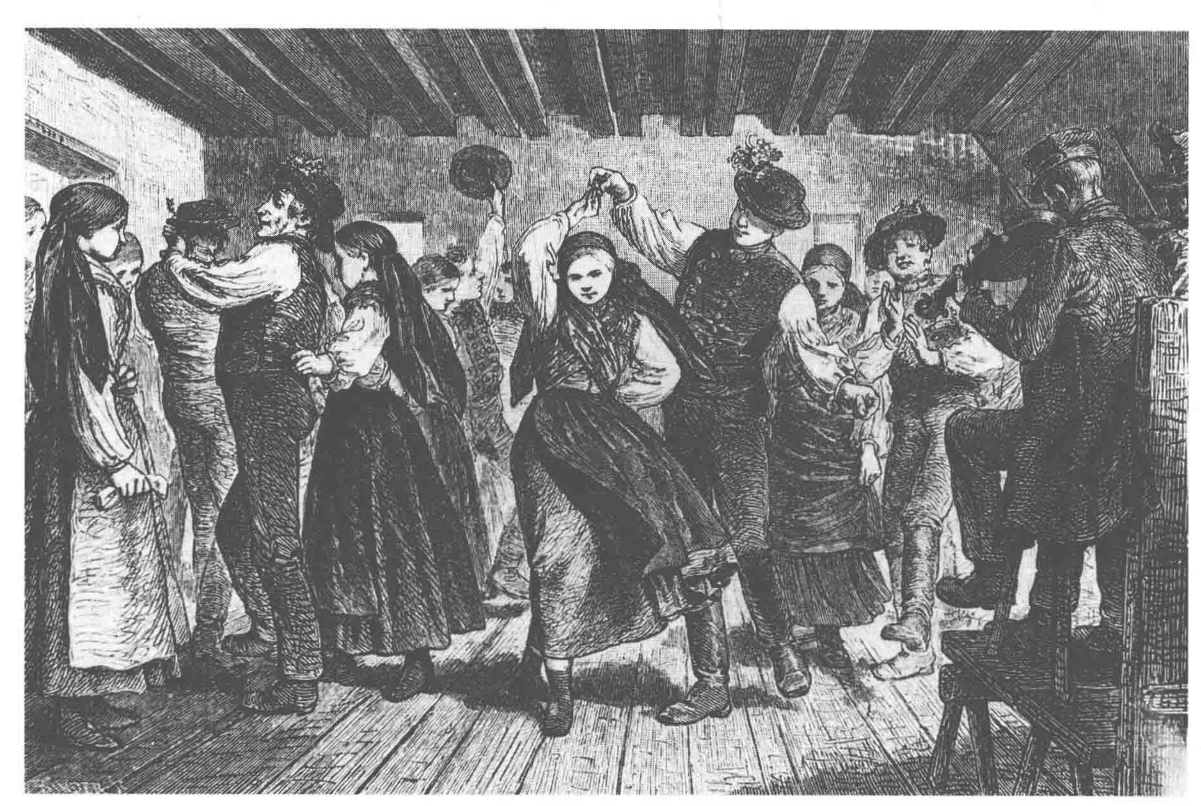
A.G. Ritter (Zur Geschichte des Orgelspiels, Leipzig, 1884, p.5) gave what seems to be the earliest description of such a cadence as being characteristic of Landini: he felt that Landini's reputation as an organist merited a place in the history of organ music but he had access to only one work by the composer, the ballata Non avrà mai pietà, printed in Kiesewetter's influential and pioneering Schicksale und Beschaffenheit (1841). On the basis of that piece alone Ritter attempted to describe Landini's musical style and drew attention to the cadence in ex.1. His book had such success, in terms of both subsequent editions and its influence on other handbooks, that the label has remained current, though evidence of that currency must be sought in the more transitory literature rather than in the standard scholarly works.



DAVID FALLOWS

Landis, Clericus de (fl 14th century). French composer. He is known only from a composition in NL-Uu 1846[2] (olim 37), in which he is described as 'bone memorie'. The composition is a three-voice rondeau, Des dont que part, with text in the top voice only (ed. in CMM, liii/1; MMN, xv, 1985; facs. in E. Schreurs, ed.: Anthologie van muziekfragmenten uit de Lage Landen, Peer, 1985). It is noteworthy for its use of syncopation in C time, as well as for the use of imitation between top voice and tenor at the opening of the two principal sections.

GILBERT REANEY

Ländler (Ger.). A folkdance in 3/4 time of varying speed: generally fast in the west (Switzerland and the Tyrol) and slow in the east (Styria, Upper and Lower Austria). Before the dissemination of the waltz, mazurka and polka in the 19th century, the ländler was the most common folkdance in Austria, south Germany and German Switzerland. It also existed in Bohemia, Moravia, Slovenia and northern Italy, and in some areas it is still popular today. The dance itself is much older than the name; in the 18th century it was simply called 'Tanz', often prefixed by a region, for example 'Salzburger Tänze', 'Ländlerische Tänze' and Beethoven's 'Mödlinger Tänze'. In the 19th century the term 'Ländler' gained widespread use, but some regions retained their distinctive terms ('Steirische Tänze' in Styria and Kärnten, 'Steirer' in Salzkammergut, 'Wickler' in Salzburg.

The Austrian court traditionally staged popular feasts called 'Wirtschaften', 'Königreiche' and 'Bauernhochzeiten' – dramatic representations of scenes from peasant life in which members of the imperial family appeared in costumes of peasants and hunters. These entertainments were in the nature of bals champêtres with folksongs and folkdances. Ex.1 shows a 'Brader' dance (after the Prater, one of Vienna's largest pleasure gardens) contrasted with a ländler, both from the 17th century. Composers such as J.H. Schmelzer wrote ballet suites containing ländlers for these festive occasions, and later both Haydn and Mozart wrote Teutsche or German Dances for the masked balls given by the court during Carnival at the Redoutensaal in the Hofburg.

The historical coherence of the ländler is primarily musical rather than choreographical. Most ländler's are for individual couples, but there are exceptions, for example the 'Schuhplattler' which is danced by a group of men. Hopping and stamping may be found in some areas but more widespread is the use of arm figures. In Upper Austria, Styria and in parts of Switzerland partners hold each other by one or two hands; in some areas partners do not hold each other at all.

The choreographic pattern of the ländler is left–right–left–right–left–right on the six crotchets of two bars, usually with every beat accented; in certain regions it is accompanied by 'Paschen' or rhythmic hand-clapping. The music consists of two strains eight or (later and under the influence of the waltz) 16 bars long, usually with each part repeated at least once. It is nearly always in a major key, is markedly diatonic, and the melody shows a tendency towards arpeggio figures, which may have influenced Alpine folksong. The ländler was usually played by two violins and a double bass, cymbal and clarinet, although today it is usually played by an accordion. The dance song (variously called 'Schnadahüpfl', 'Gstanzl', 'Tanzl'), when the dancers sing or yodel to the ländler, can be in crotchets, or with many quavers (like the ländler). Vocal descendants of the ländler retain the musical form but are slower and not used for dancing. Silcher's Ännchen von Tharau (ex.2), a folksong from the Tyrol, is a descendant of the 'Schnadahüpfl'. Individual ländlers are sometimes gathered together to form a ländler chain, examples of which are provided by Schubert's dances for piano D145, 366, 681 and 734. In Upper Austria the lengthening of the third crotchet in the bar has developed in to a ländler in common time. By tradition the ländler music is played from memory, yet many players have 'Partien' or 'Schnoasn', notebooks in which they enter various ländlers, sometimes in a much abbreviated form and according to key. These musical 'stenographs' are never complete and, moreover, do not contain rhythmic variants and embellishments. Zoder is said to have possessed a collection of over 11,000 ländler melodies. The practice is now extinct.

The ländler was used by such Austrian symphonists as Haydn, Mozart, Bruckner and Mahler, whose minuet or scherzo movements are frequently ländler-like. The Carinthian tune in Berg's Violin Concerto is a true ländler melody, as is the waltz in Act 1 of Weber's Der Freischütz. Some of Brahms's songs are in ländler style, including Der Schmied, Sonntag, Wiegenlied and Vergebliches Ständchen.

MOSCO CARNER/R

Lando, Stefano (b Naples, *c*1530; d Naples, April 1571). Italian composer. Cerreto mentioned him as one of 'the excellent composers from the city of Naples, now no longer living'. In 1559 he was appointed keeper of the vihuelas at the royal palace of Naples, and was also chamber musician to the Duke of Alcalà, Viceroy of Naples. His Primo libro de madrigali a quattro voci (Venice, 1558, incomplete) contains 39 madrigals; five three-voice napolitane appeared in contemporary collections (RISM 1566[9], 1566[10], 1570[18]). He may also be the composer of six works for two to four instruments (in I-Rn 156/1–4).

PIER PAOLO SCATTOLIN

Landolfi, Carlo Ferdinando (b *c*1710; d Baveno, 22 Nov 1784). Italian violin maker. He worked in Milan from about 1750 onwards. It is not known who taught him the art of violin making but he may have been associated with G.B. Guadagnini, who went there in 1749. His instruments draw much more from the Guadagnini workshop than from the earlier Milanese makers. By the mid-1750s he was producing his best violins, elegant in design and neat in workmanship, though with strong personal character. The varnish is rich in appearance, sometimes the deep red of the Venetians but more often a lighter orange-brown. His violins are desirable tonally, but mostly not in the same class as those of Guadagnini. Equally interesting are his violas, varying in size from a minute 38·1 cm body length, to a good 38·9 cm model and an occasional splendid pattern just over 40·6 cm. In comparison, Landolfi cellos are invariably small, though still good instruments.

Landolfi's main pupils were Pietro Giovanni Mantegazza and his own son Pietro Antonio Landolfi (b *c*1730; d Baveno, 13 Nov 1795). Some of Pietro Antonio's instruments were spoilt by their rather high build and a harder varnish than that used by his father. The younger Landolfi's influence is increasingly noticeable in the Landolfi instruments after 1760, but his enthusiasm for the craft seems to have waned from 1770.

CHARLES BEARE/CARLO CHIESA

Landon [née Fuhrmann], Christa (b Berlin, 23 Sept 1921; d Funchal, Madeira, 19 Nov 1977). Austrian musicologist. She studied the piano and organ with Bruno Seidlhofer, theory with Joseph Marx and Alfred Uhl and the harpsichord with Isolde Ahlgrimm at the Vienna Music Academy, and had private lessons in analysis with Webern. After passing the final harpsichord examination (1948), she worked for the Haydn Society in Boston and Vienna (1949–58), collaborating with H.C. Robbins Landon, then her husband, on publications and research. In 1959 she began working as a freelance editor, specializing in editions of Haydn (symphonies and cassations), Mozart (serenades) and Bach (Brandenburg Concertos, etc.). With Walther Dürr and Arnold Feil she was general editor of the new Schubert edition (1964–77), contributing herself two volumes containing symphonies and the piano music for four hands, and helping to revise (in 1978) Deutsch's 1951 thematic catalogue of Schubert's works. In the course of her editorial work she discovered about 50 sheets of hitherto unknown Schubert autographs in Vienna (see ÖMz, xxiv, 1969, pp.299–323; Eng. trans., MR, xxxi, 1970, pp.215–31); she published two rediscovered songs Vollendung and Die Erde (Kassel, 1970). With Alexander Weinmann she also discovered a proof copy of Beethoven's Piano Sonata op.111 with corrections in the composer's hand (see FAM, xxvi, 1979, pp.281–94). She also wrote on Haydn (see Haydn-Studien, iv, 1978, pp.113–17) and her articles on Schubert have been reprinted in Christa Landon zum Gedächtnis (Tübingen, 1978; incl. list of writings). She was killed in an aeroplane crash.

RUDOLF KLEIN

Landon, H(oward) C(handler) Robbins (b Boston, 6 March 1926). American musicologist. After studying music theory with Alfred Swan, composition with Harl McDonald and English literature with W.H. Auden at Swarthmore College (1943–5), and music with Karl Geiringer and Hugo Norton at Boston University (1945–7, MusB 1947), he worked as a music critic for American papers in England, France, Holland and Austria (1947–9). In 1949 he founded the HAYDN SOCIETY, of which he became secretary general (1949–51), and which planned a complete edition of Haydn's works. He edited the Haydn Yearbook from its inception in 1962. He has held appointments as professor of music at Queens College, New York (1969), and regis professor at the University of California at Davis (1970); he was John Bird Professor of Music at the University of Wales, Cardiff (1978–93) and a fellow of Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford (1979). He has been awarded honorary doctorates by Boston University (1969), Queen's University, Belfast (1974), Bristol University (1981) and the New England Conservatory (1989). He was presented with the Siemens Prize (1991) and the Medal of Honour of the Handel and Haydn Society (1993).

Landon started publishing material on Haydn and critical editions of his music in the late 1940s. His book The Symphonies of Joseph Haydn (1955) discusses new chronologies and texts, setting the works in the broad context of 18th-century music and of Haydn's output as a whole. He continued to draw fresh public and scholarly attention to other Haydn works, notably the masses and operas, several of which he published in new editions, stimulating performances and provoking a reappraisal of Haydn as a dramatic composer. The culmination of his work on Haydn was the five-volume Haydn: Chronicle and Works (1976–80); it and the book on the symphonies represent major landmarks in Haydn studies. He has also contributed to Mozart scholarship and has done much work on the sources of Austrian 18th-century music in general. Some of his work, for example 1791: Mozart's Last Year (1988) and Vivaldi: Voice of the Baroque (1993), is directed towards a broader public – 1791 in particular has been widely translated and much reprinted. Some of his work (particularly on composers slightly outside his specialist field, for example Vivaldi, J.C. Bach and Beethoven) has been criticized for lacking the scholarly precision that distinguished his earlier research, particularly that on Haydn.

Landormy, Paul (Charles René) (b Issy-les-Moulineaux, 3 Jan 1869; d Paris, 17 Nov 1943). French musicologist and composer. He was an agrégé des lettres of the Ecole Normale and taught philosophy in Roanne and Bar-le-Duc; he later wrote on Socrates and Descartes. He began to study music in Paris in 1892, taking singing lessons from Giovanni Sbriglia and Pol Plançon whose niece, a pianist, he married in 1897. From 1902 he worked with Romain Rolland organizing courses in music history at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes, where he also founded and directed the acoustics laboratory (1904–7). Landormy was a regular contributor to Le temps and in 1918 was appointed music critic of La victoire. He also served as secretary of the music section of the Paris International Exhibition (1937) and as editor-in-chief of the series Collection des Chefs d'Oeuvre de la Musique Expliqués, to which he contributed a volume on Gounod's Faust. His compositions include piano pieces and songs.

JOHN TREVITT

Landowska, Wanda (b Warsaw, 5 July 1879; d Lakeville, CT, 16 Aug 1959). Polish keyboard player and composer. She was a champion of 17th- and 18th-century music and the leading figure in the 20th-century revival of the harpsichord. Her date of birth has been variously given, but on her passport is 5 July 1879.

She played the piano from the age of four; her first teachers were Jan Kleczyński and then, at the Warsaw Conservatory, Aleksander Michałowski, both Chopin specialists. In 1896 she went to Berlin and studied composition under Heinrich Urban, but was, in her own words, 'refractory to rules'. From this period date some songs, Kolysanka for voice and piano and Paysage triste for string orchestra. She won two prizes in 1903 in the Musica International Competition with a piano piece and a song, causing Massenet to declare 'Elle a du talent, beaucoup de talent'. She had already shown an enthusiasm for Bach (then played mostly in transcriptions), and was beginning to make a reputation as a pianist. In 1900 she moved to Paris, married Henry Lew (an authority on Hebrew folklore, killed in a car accident in 1919) and with his help threw herself energetically into research on every aspect of 17th- and 18th-century music and its interpretation. She played Bach concertos (on the piano) at the Schola Cantorum, with which she was associated for the next decade, but became increasingly convinced that only the harpsichord was really appropriate to this period. She first played the harpsichord in public in 1903 and subsequently made concert tours in Europe (including Russia, where Tolstoy was interested in her playing and her ideas), at the same time assiduously writing what she herself later recognized as 'belligerent' articles to overcome the resistance widely shown towards the harpsichord, largely on account of the feeble tone of the available instruments. In 1909 she published her book Musique ancienne, and three years later at the Breslau Bach Festival triumphantly introduced a large new two-manual harpsichord built to her own specification by Pleyel. In 1913 she began a harpsichord class at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin, where she and her husband were detained as civil prisoners on parole during World War I.

Immediately after the war Landowska played a harpsichord continuo in the St Matthew Passion – for the first time in the 20th century – in Basle, where she held masterclasses before returning to Paris, which she made her home; she lectured at the Sorbonne and gave classes at the Ecole Normale. With four Pleyel harpsichords, she made her first visit to the USA in 1923, appearing with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski and making her first gramophone records (she had made some piano rolls in 1905); she also toured extensively in other countries. In 1925 she settled at Saint-Leu-la-Fôret (north of Paris) where she founded an Ecole de Musique Ancienne which attracted students from all over the world to private and public courses; the summer concerts held in its concert hall (built 1927) were to become celebrated. There, in 1933, she gave the first integral performance of Bach's Goldberg Variations. When the Germans approached Paris in 1940 – anti-aircraft fire can be heard in her recording of Scarlatti sonatas – she had to abandon the school, her library of over 10,000 volumes and her valuable collection of instruments; after several months at Banyuls-sur-Mer, near the Spanish border, she went to New York, where in February 1942 she was rapturously received for her performance of the Goldberg Variations. She toured widely in the USA, performing and teaching, and found a new home in Lakeville, Connecticut. At the age of 70 she recorded the complete Bach '48'.

Wanda Landowska at the harpsichord

Decorated by both the French and Polish governments, Landowska was also held in the highest esteem by the entire musical world. Concertos were written for her by Falla and Poulenc (Concert champêtre); many of her pupils later became eminent harpsichordists, and she exercised an even wider influence through her numerous writings and recordings. She developed modern harpsichord technique, particularly in matters of fingering, and laid emphasis on good touch and on the acquisition of a true legato and of variety of articulation. Her own playing was characterized by its vigour and sparkling vitality, which contrasted with her seemingly frail figure and the unobtrusive way she glided on to a platform, although she radiated a deep and serene confidence. She gave spirit precedence over letter, and did not hesitate to add such things as superfluous petites reprises in Bach's Goldberg Variations. If her registrations, in her many recordings, appear over-coloured for later taste, these arise partly from the nature of the instrument she used and, like the vehemence of many of her writings, seemed necessary at the time to counter objections to the 'bloodlessness' of the harpsichord.

Her writings reveal the thoroughness of preparation and the imaginative insight she brought to her performances; an extensive selection of these (many of them reworkings of previous material) is to be found in Landowska on Music (New York, 1965), edited by her disciple Denise Restout. It includes a list of her compositions (among them the Pologne variations for two pianos, several arrangements of Polish folksongs and a Liberation Fanfare in honour of Charles de Gaulle) and a discography (which is complete except for the Mozart and Poulenc items issued by the International Piano Library, IPL 106–7).

LIONEL SALTER

Landowski, Marcel (b Pont-l'Abbé, Finistère, 18 Feb 1915). French composer and administrator. As a high-ranking official in the Ministry of Culture from the 1960s he was a moving spirit in the reorganization of music in France, and was thus one of the central figures in French musical life during the last three decades of the 20th century. He is the son of the sculptor Paul Landowski, whose famous statue of Christ overlooks the bay of Rio de Janeiro, and the great-grandson of the violinist and composer Henri Vieuxtemps. Landowski decided to become a composer at the age of seven, during an end-of-term concert at the Marguerite Long school where he was a star pupil. When he was 13 his father encouraged him to show his first scores to the composer Raoul Laparra. Four years later he entered the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied harmony with Paul Fauchet, counterpoint and fugue with Noël Gallon, conducting with Gaubert and composition with Busser. He also studied conducting with Pierre Monteux, who conducted some of the first performances of Landowski's works, including Les sorcières and Les sept loups (both 1937).

Even in 1937, when he was still a student, Marcel Landowski made his independent mark as a composer with works that successfully eschewed Conservatoire academicism. He continued to reject dogmatic precepts, serialism notably: the only influence he has acknowledged is that of Honegger, with whom, since their first meeting in 1941, he enjoyed a lasting friendship. Landowski has always preferred to subordinate his style to the dramatic content of his scores. Respecting classical forms and faithful to tradition, he has expressed himself most fully in stage music, especially operas like Le rire de Nils Halerius, Le fou, L'opéra de poussière and Montségur, and in such works as his symphony Jean de la Peur, his Messe de l'Aurore and Un enfant appelle, written for Mstislav Rostropovitch and Galina Vishnevskaya, to whom he also dedicated his opera Galina.

In 1960 Landowski embarked upon an administrative career, initially as director of the conservatoire of Boulogne-Billancourt, the district in the Parisian region where he lived. In 1964, after two years as music director of the Comédie-Française, the writer André Malraux, Minister of Culture in General de Gaulle's government, appointed him inspector-general of music education, and then entrusted the department of music in the Ministry of Cultural Affairs to him. From 1970 to 1975 he was director of music, opera and dance. In the course of these ten years in the Ministry he pursued a policy of renovating and decentralizing music teaching, reforming the opera in France – most notably by appointing Rolf Liebermann to direct the Opéra in Paris – founding festivals and symphonic ensembles, including the Orchestre de Paris which he entrusted in 1967 to his old friend Charles Münch, and encouraging the state to support musical creativity. From 1977 to 1979 he pursued the same policy as director of cultural affairs for the city of Paris. Since 1975 he has been a member of the Institut de France at the Académie des Beaux-Arts, of which he became permanent secretary in 1986, and in 1994 he was appointed chancellor of the Institut de France, a post he occupied until 1999. In 1991 he became chairman and managing director of Editions Salabert, and he is also active in the Association Musique Nouvelle en Liberté, which he founded with the aim of promoting creativity in the musical institutions of France.

BRUNO SERROU

Landré, Guillaume (b The Hague, 24 Feb 1905; d Amsterdam, 6 Nov 1968). Dutch composer. The son of Willem Landré, he received his early musical training from his father and from Zagwijn. He went on to study law at Utrecht University, while at the same time a composition pupil of Pijper. Landré fulfilled several functions in public musical life, including president of the Genootschap van Nederlandse Componisten, vice-president of the ISCM and a member of the Donemus Foundation, of the Stichting de Nederlandse Opera and of the Concertgebouw Orchestra, of which, from 1952 to 1955, he also acted as artistic director. He was an authority in the field of authors' rights and played an active role in both national and international authors' rights organizations.

His style was at first influenced by Pijper, as evident, for example, in the Piano Trio (1929). Landré adopted the then current principle of avoiding note repetition, and based many of his subsequent compositions on 12-note rows (as for instance in his Third Symphony), without, however, adhering to a strict dodecaphonic technique. In his later orchestral works he sometimes used titles which refer to specific formal or technical devices (e.g. Anagrammen and Permutazioni sinfoniche). Nevertheless, the content or character of the works remains similar to that of his symphonies, and is often highly expressive. In 1964 he received the Sweelinck Award in recognition of his lifetime's work.

MARIUS FLOTHUIS

Landry, Richard [Dickie] (b Cecilia, LA, 16 Nov 1938). American saxophonist and composer. He received the BME from the University of Southwestern Louisiana in 1962 and studied the flute with Arthur Lora in the early 1960s. He was well known as a member of the Philip Glass Ensemble from 1968 until 1981, during which time he appeared in all of the ensemble's concerts and recordings, including the seminal Einstein on the Beach (1979). In the early 1970s he began pursuing his own solo career, performing throughout Europe, the Americas, Russia, India and Japan. He has also worked with other performing and visual artists, including David Byrne, Laurie Anderson, Robert Rauschenberg, Paul Simon, Robert Wilson and Richard Serra. In 1973 he developed a new electronic performance process – quadraphonic delay – that enables him to perform with four mirror images or echoes of himself. This technique is best demonstrated in his solo album 15 Saxophones (1976). His improvisational compositions combine the various styles and idioms of jazz, classical and contemporary music; his most significant through-composed work is the Mass for Pentecost Sunday (1987).

Landry was also one of the early pioneers of video art. His videotapes, showing him in performance, often with close-up images of his hands or mouth, have been exhibited in museums and galleries throughout the world. These works include 1, 2, 3, 4, (1969), Sax I (1970), Sax II (1972), Quadraphonic Delay Suite (1973) and Divided Alto (1974).

CHARLES PASSY/JON GIBSON

Landsberg, Ludwig (b Breslau, 1807; d Rome, 6 May 1858). German musician and collector. After beginning his career as a tenor in the chorus of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, he settled in Rome and lived there for 24 years. He studied the piano and organized successful amateur concerts. He also devoted himself intensively to the study of early music and musical literature. His wide knowledge helped him to amass a valuable library, drawn from all over Italy and Germany. At his death, his heirs conveyed part of the collection to Breslau and part to Berlin, and catalogues were prepared to enable it to be acquired by music lovers. But many of the choicest items appear to have vanished (this statement is derived from Fétis, who seems to have known Landsberg by correspondence and received from him a manuscript catalogue on which he based his comparisons). Nevertheless, some of the greatest treasures, including a number of Beethoven sketchbooks, found their way into the Königliche Bibliothek (later called the Preussische Staatsbibliothek) in Berlin; most of them remain in the collections of the Deutsche Staatsbibliothek and the Staatsbibliothek der Stiftung Preussischer Kulturbesitz in Berlin.

ALEC HYATT KING

Landsbergis, Vytautas (b Kaunas, 18 Oct 1932). Lithuanian musicologist. He studied at the J. Gruodis Music School (from 1946) and later at the Lithuanian State Conservatory (from 1950). He taught the piano and was an accompanist at the M.K. Čiurlionis Music School (1952–5), after which he became a lecturer (1957–63) and, having gained the doctorate in musicology in 1969, professor (1978–90) at the Lithuanian State Conservatory. He was in addition a lecturer and associate professor at both the Vilnius Pedagogical Institute (1957–74) and the affiliated conservatory departments in Klaipėda (1974–8). Landsbergis was chairman of the Lithuanian Reform movement Sajudis from 1988 to 1990, during the troubled times preceding Lithuania's independence from the Soviet Union. On independence he was made President of Parliament – the Head of State of Lithuania (1990–92) and served as co-chairman of the Council of Baltic States. He has remained a powerful political figure as leader of the opposition (1992–6) and chairman of the Seimas (Parliament) of the Republic of Lithuania (1996–). He has been awarded many honorary degrees, at the Loyola University in Chicago (1991), Weber State University in Ogden, Utah (1992), and at the universities of Kaunas (1992) and Klaipėda (1997). Among various other awards he has received are the Lithuanian SSR Award (1975; 1988) and the Norwegian People's Peace Prize (1991).

Despite his political activities, Landsbergis has continued to pursue his career as a musicologist. He has written on a number of Lithuanian composers, for example Balys Dvarionas and Česlovas Sasnauskas, but his particular interest is the work of M.K. Čiurlionis, on which he is the leading expert. He has recorded (EMI 1998, CD) and produced editions of Čiulionis's works for piano (Leningrad, 1975, 2/1980; Cracow, 1978; Vilnius, 1985, 1990, 2/1997) and choir (Leningrad, 1983) and has prepared studies that examine his life and music, art, written (word) creation. In 1987 he was elected chairman of the M.K. Čiurlionis Society, and in 1995 he became chairman of the organizing committee for the international M.K. Čiurlionis piano and organ competition.

JOHN TYRRELL

Landshoff, Ludwig (b Stettin [now Szczecin, Poland], 3 June 1874; d New York, 20 Sept 1941). German musicologist and conductor. He studied music with Thuille, Heinrich Urban and Reger and musicology with Friedlaender and Oskar Fleischer at Berlin University and with Sandberger at the University of Munich, where he took the doctorate in 1900 with a dissertation on Johann Rudolf Zumsteeg. He was subsequently an opera conductor at the theatres in Aachen (1902–4), Kiel (1912–13), Breslau (1913–15) and Würzburg (1915–20), and music director of the Munich Bachverein (1918–28), where he performed a wide variety of music, including that of Bach's sons, Pergolesi, Hasse and Jommelli as well as contemporary works. When the municipal subsidy was stopped in 1928 he moved to Berlin; his activity there was confined to occasional broadcasts, lectures at the Lessing Hochschule and library research. He emigrated to Italy in 1936 and later to Paris (1938) and to New York (1941).

Landshoff's reputation rests chiefly on his research into the vocal music of the 17th and 18th centuries. His most important work was his Alte Meister des Bel Canto, a collection in five volumes that printed for the first time (and furnished with comprehensive bibliographical and historical notes) vocal works by Carissimi, Luigi Rossi, Mario Savioni and others. He made many other editions of vocal and instrumental works by Domenico Gabrielli, J.S. Bach, J.C. Bach, C.P.E. Bach, Vivaldi, Zelter, Zumsteeg, Fasch, Haydn and Rossini. In his studies of the problems of accompaniment and performance he aimed at reaching a wide audience while attempting to give an authentic representation of the original style.

ALFRED GRANT GOODMAN

Lane [Levy], Burton (b New York, 2 Feb 1912; d New York, 5 Jan 1997). American songwriter. At the age of 15 he was engaged as a pianist-songwriter by the music publishers Remick & Co., serving an apprenticeship that prepared him for a songwriting career on Broadway and in Hollywood, during which he collaborated with such noted lyricists as Loesser, E.Y. Harburg and Lerner. His earliest compositions were songs for musical stage revues including Three's a Crowd (1930), The Third Little Show (1931) and Earl Carroll Vanities (1931). From 1933 to 1954 he lived in California where he wrote songs for approximately 30 films, including 'Everything I Have is Yours' (Dancing Lady, 1933), 'How About You' (Babes on Broadway, 1941) and 'Too Late Now' (Royal Wedding, 1951). During this period he also returned to work on Broadway, providing scores for Hold On To Your Hats (Harburg, 1940), Laffing Room Only (Lane, 1944) and Finian's Rainbow (Harburg, 1947). In the last of these, a mixture of fantasy and satire and Lane's greatest success, his sense of melodic wit ('Something Sort of Grandish'), harmonic invention ('Old Devil Moon') and popular grace ('How Are Things in Glocca Mora?') found its most consistent outlet. While his subsequent output was relatively small, Lane's meticulous craftsmanship remained evident in his two Broadway theatre scores, On a Clear Day You Can See Forever (1965) and Carmelina (1979), both collaborations with Lerner, and the animated musical film Heidi's Song (Cahn, 1982).

Stylistically Lane's work is perhaps best understood in terms of the great flowering of American popular song that took place in the second quarter of the 20th century. He also sought to protect songwriters from piracy of their work, and from 1957 to 1967 he was the president of the American Guild of Authors and Composers (now the Songwriters Guild of America).

Lane, (Sidney) Eastwood (b Brewerton, NY, 22 Nov 1879; d Central Square, NY, 22 Jan 1951). American composer. He studied Belles Lettres at Syracuse University, a course that included a weekly class in music, but did not complete the degree. In 1910 Alexander Russell, whom he had met at Syracuse, became the concert director of the Wanamaker Auditorium, New York, and invited Lane to work as his assistant. Lane married Modena Scovill, a professor of music theory at New York University in 1933. He retired in 1935 but continued composing.

Largely self-taught, Lane familiarized himself with the works of MacDowell, Debussy and others from piano rolls played on an Ampico player piano. He regarded composition as a hobby and showed little interest in compositional theory. He found the process of notating a work an agonizing chore and would customarily commit entire pieces to memory before writing them down. His compositions, primarily for solo piano, reflect a profound interest in American legends, folk music and literature. Occasionally the influences of Asian and medieval music are also present. Although strongly influenced by MacDowell's style, Lane employed a rich harmonic language that was all his own. A resourceful and idiosyncratic treatment of thematic material is also characteristic of his work.

Lanfranco, Giovanni Maria (b Terenzo, nr Parma, *c*1490; d Parma, late Nov 1545). Italian theorist. In the dedication of the first book of his Scintille di musica he names Lodovico Milanese as his organ teacher (perhaps in Lucca after 1512); the expression 'mio Burtio Parmegiano' may indicate that he studied music with Nicolò Burzio or simply denote friendship. He was maestro di cappella at Brescia Cathedral from 1528 to about 1536, when he assumed the same post in Verona. According to Pietro Aaron, he was forced to flee Verona in 1538 for having violated a boy. He became an Augustinian monk at a small monastery near Bergamo, but two years later returned to Parma to become maestro di cappella at the Chiesa della Madonna della Steccata, where he remained until his death.

Lanfranco's Scintille di musica is the earliest comprehensive treatise on music theory in Italian. Written deliberately in the 'universale Italiana favella' (i.e. lingua cortigiana), it was aimed at beginners, with the emphasis on practice. It is divided into four books. The first deals with the elements of music: the three genera, hexachords and properties, the Guidonian hand, clefs, mutation, intervals, chant notation, note values and text underlay. The second, dedicated to his nephew Genesio Lanfranco, explains mensural notation and proportions (of intervals and notes), with numerous examples. His explanation of the beat in various mensurations is especially valuable, as is his discussion of fitting words to music, the earliest major statement on the subject. The third part, dedicated to a singer at Brescia Cathedral, is a brief discourse on the modes in plainchant, following the doctrine of Marchetto of Padua. The last part, dedicated to two singers, deals with counterpoint as Lanfranco taught it to his choristers. This is improvised counterpoint, learnt through the contrapuntal hand. Seemingly as an afterthought, Lanfranco then added a substantial and important section on the tuning of instruments: keyboard (with instructions for tempering 5ths, 4ths and 3rds), bowed string instruments (with and without frets), harps, citterns, and lutes.

A second treatise, Terentiana, referred to frequently in the Scintille, has not survived, if ever completed; unlike the Scintille it was to be written in pure Tuscan, for more advanced students. In it there was to have been further discussion of the modes.

Lanfranco's only known composition is an enigmatic canon on a humanistic text, sent to Adrian Willaert in 1531 as a peace offering after having offended the master. The Rimario is a catalogue of Petrarch's rhymes.

BONNIE J. BLACKBURN

Lang, B(enjamin) J(ohnson) (b Salem, MA, 28 Dec 1837; d Boston, 4 April 1909). American pianist, conductor, organist, teacher and composer. Lang's career as a conductor was of signal importance in Boston's musical life. After early studies with his father, Benjamin Lang, and Francis G. Hill in Boston, he became organist and choirmaster of a Boston church at the age of 15. He went to Europe in 1855 to study composition in Berlin and piano with Alfred Jaëll and Liszt. He made his first public appearance in Boston immediately after his return in 1858, and from the early 1860s was prominent as a pianist. He promoted many new works, including Tchaikovsky's First Concerto and Brahms's Second, which he played with the Boston SO (he had been the conductor at the world première of the Tchaikovsky concerto in Hans von Bülow's Boston concert in 1875); in two 'Bach Concerto Concerts', in December 1898 and January 1899, he played on an Erard harpsichord imported from Paris.

He was a solid orchestral conductor and unsurpassed as a choral director, in which area he was Boston's principal exponent for four decades. He made his début in Boston on 3 May 1862 with the local première of Mendelssohn's Die erste Walpurgisnacht. His major contribution as a choral conductor came from his work with the Apollo Club, a men's singing society found in 1871, and the Cecilia Society, a mixed chorus established in 1874, both of which he formed and led for several years. The early repertory of both choirs consisted mostly of German works, some of which were given their first Boston (or even first American) performances under Lang. From about 1880 he began to introduce much more American music, including works composed especially for the singers, such as Dudley Buck's The Nun of Nidaros, George E. Whiting's March of the Monks of Bangor and Chadwick's The Viking's Last Voyage.

Lang's many connections with singers and instrumentalists in Boston and his remarkable abilities as an organizer made possible two of his most elaborate contributions to Boston's musical life: the first complete performances there of Berlioz's La damnation de Faust (1880) and Parsifal in concert form (1891). An ardent Wagnerian, Lang visited Wagner in July 1871 and offered his assistance in publicizing the Bayreuth Festival in America. In 1876 he was an honoured guest at the first performance of the Ring in Bayreuth.

Lang was active as an organist all his life, and had a reputation as a magnificent improviser. He played an important part in the planning of the organ in Boston's Music Hall, and he performed in the inaugural concerts for the instrument in 1863. From 1859 to 1895 he was the organist of the Handel and Haydn Society. He also devoted much time to teaching, and his pupils included Arthur Foote, who began piano and organ lessons with him in 1874, Ethelbert Nevin and W.F. Apthorp. He was imaginative in the invention of new exercises and promoted 'the principle of sensible relaxation at a time when few teachers ... had awakened to the importance of this' (Foote).

Lang composed, though he published little; even with the ensembles he conducted, he rarely performed his own music. Yet he produced an oratorio, David, as well as symphonies, overtures, piano pieces, church music, and songs. Yale awarded him an honorary MA in 1903. Lang's family, correspondence, and diaries, together with some scrapbooks of programmes from 1861 to 1906, are in the Boston Public Library.

STEVEN LEDBETTER

Lang, Bernhard (Ingomar) (b Linz, 24 Feb 1957). Austrian composer. He studied at the Bruckner Conservatory in Linz (1972–5), at the Graz Musikhochschule (jazz, 1975–83, composition, 1982–8), where his teachers included Dobrowolski, Pressl and Georg Friedrich Haas, and privately with Gösta Neuwirth. He also studied philosophy and German studies at Graz University (1976–81). In 1989 he attended the Darmstadt summer courses, where he encountered Cage and Lachenmann. He has taught at the Graz Conservatory (1984–9) and the Graz Musikhochschule (from 1989), and worked on composition software for CADMUS (Computer Aided Design for Musical Applications). He has also served as an arranger and pianist for various jazz ensembles (1977–81), and realized projects that transcend the boundaries between genres.

Composition techniques such as the non-intentional and constructivist aspects of Josef Matthias Hauer's 12-note system and the diminutions of late medieval polyphony reflect a link between Lang's work as a composer and his work for CADMUS. His music also reflects his experiences of performance art and installations, as well as his work in jazz, improvisatory, punk and rock music, though without actual borrowing of the idioms themselves. His aesthetic, which integrates noise and music, stands at a point of intersection between the music of Cage and Lachenmann on the one hand, and rock music and free improvisation on the other. Furthermore, the complexity and intricacy of the notation in Lang's scores force the transformation of instrumental virtuosity into something closer to improvisation. His high degree of technical extravagance and organization contrasts with the varied and fragile nature of his musical results. (LZMÖ)

BERNHARD GÜNTHER

Lang, David (Avery) (b Los Angeles, 8 Jan 1957). American composer. He attended Stanford University (AB 1978), the University of Iowa (MM 1980) and Yale University (DMA 1989); his principal teachers included Lou Harrison, Martin Bresnick, Leland Smith, Jacob Druckman, Roger Reynolds and Morton Subotnick. He also studied at Tanglewood with Henze. While at Yale, Lang became involved in Bresnick's concert series Sheep's Clothing, which took an eclectic and unconventional approach to the presentation of new works. He drew heavily on such non-doctrinaire attitudes when he co-founded, with Michael Gordon and Julia Wolfe, the Bang on a Can festival in New York (1981). Also involved in theatre music, he became composer-in-residence at the American Conservatory Theater, San Francisco, in 1992.

Lang's works, while readily accessible to the ear, are derived from highly mathematical and intensely detailed formal structures. He sees his compositions as dividing into two categories: static works exhibiting a postminimalist flat form, such as Orpheus Over and Under, Slow Movement and Face So Pale; and developmental works, such as Spud and Are You Experienced?. Orpheus Over and Under for two pianos maintains a sadly soothing minimalist surface comprised of quick repeated notes and tremolos. The rhythmic entrance of pitches in the work, however, is strictly controlled down to the semiquaver by golden section proportions. Similarly, the virtuoso Illumination Rounds for violin and piano is in a progressive variation form; semiquavers, constituting 55-note number sequences, are shaped into phrases by conforming to numerical patterns determined by the Fibonacci series.

While complex organizational systems often operate on microstructural levels, larger gestures in Lang's works are more intuitively dramatic. The colourful titles of his compositions reflect this (Eating Living Monkeys, Spud) as do their occasional references to pop music. Are You Experienced?, named after a Jimi Hendrix tune, contains narration that begins: 'I know you were looking forward to hearing this piece, but something terrible has just happened. While we were busy setting up, someone crept up silently behind you and dealt a quick blow to the side of your head'. The music then throbs like a head wound, simulating a disconcerted stream of consciousness. Three operas number among Lang's theatre works, the most important being Modern Painters, based on the life of the 19th-century art critic John Ruskin.

Lang, Eddie [Dunn, Blind Willie; Massaro, Salvatore] (b Philadelphia, 25 Oct 1902; d New York, 26 March 1933). American jazz guitarist. He studied the violin formally for 11 years and learnt guitar from his father, a guitarist and instrument maker. With the violinist Joe Venuti, his former schoolmate in Philadelphia, he formed a successful and long-lived partnership, and the two played together in the early 1920s in Atlantic City, New Jersey. By 1924, when he recorded with the Mound City Blue Blowers, Lang had moved to New York. There he performed and recorded frequently with, among others, Red Nichols, Jean Goldkette, Frankie Trumbauer, the Dorsey brothers, Paul Whiteman and above all Venuti, with whom he made a series of duet recordings (1926–8), including the noteworthy Stringing the Blues (1926, Col.), their recomposition of Tiger Rag. He also recorded some duos with Lonnie Johnson (1928–9) and, under the pseudonym Blind Willie Dunn, two titles (1929) with a group called the Gin Bottle Four (which included Johnson and King Oliver). After playing with Whiteman (1929–30) Lang became Bing Crosby's accompanist.

Lang was the first well-known solo jazz guitarist and, from the mid-1920s, was widely influential. His career coincided with the development of recording techniques suited to the acoustic guitar, which, partly through his influence, supplanted the banjo as a jazz instrument. He was highly regarded for his single-string solos and his accompaniments, which usually interspersed chords and single-string lines in the middle register. While some contemporary black guitarists were better soloists, Lang's accompaniments resulted in interesting textures (but with rather undirected lines at times); he was a good rhythm guitarist with a fine technique and attained a consistently high level of performance.

JAMES DAPOGNY/R

Láng, István (b Budapest, 1 March 1933). Hungarian composer. He studied composition with Viski and later Szabó at the Liszt Academy of Music, Budapest (1950–58). He was later musical director of the State Puppet Theatre (1966–84). In 1973 he joined the staff of the Liszt Academy, chamber music branch, and was guest lecturer at the University of Colorado and at the University of New Mexico, CNM Mexico City. He has received the Erkel Prize (1968, 1975), was made Artist of Merit (1985) and has won the Bartók-Pásztori Prize (1994).

A leading representative of the generation of Hungarian composers born in the 1930s, Láng has forged a personal style which assimilates aleatorism and serialism and which frequently builds on motivic cells. In the 1960s he was absorbed in writing for the stage, and a sense of theatre also informs Láng's chamber and solo instrumental works, among them Monodia for clarinet, which is intended for stage or concert performance. His opera for television, Álom a színházról ('Dream about the Theatre', 1980–81), abandons conventional narrative in favour of creating a bizarre sense of the unreal; the personalities of the characters, for example, change freely between scenes.

Another of Láng's preoccupations has been cyclic form. His early pieces (e.g. the Concertino and the Chamber Cantata) are typically in two movements, but later he came to cast his music in sequences of short movements constructed from small motifs, or 'micro-organisms'. This is shown in the second wind quintet and the third string quartet. In several works the proportions of the movements are determined by mathematical series – for example, the Fibonacci-type series in Gyász-zene ('Funeral music') and Laudate hominem (5–6–11–17–28). Other features of his work are the careful balancing of free and strict parts in those works which employ aleatory writing, and the extreme, yet always musical, exploitation of instrumental possibilities in chamber pieces. Later works in addition experiment with electronic music, as in Esteledés ('Nightfall', 1997), which manipulates sounds of a trumpet and Korean bell.

ANTAL BORONKAY/RACHEL BECKLES WILLSON

Lang, Johann Georg (b Schweissing [now Svojšín], *c*1722; d Ehrenbreitstein, 17 July 1798). German composer of Bohemian descent. As a youth he studied the keyboard and violin in Prague. In 1746 he began service in the orchestra of the Prince-Bishop of Augsburg (Joseph, Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt). After mid-1749 he embarked on a three-year trip to Italy and for a year studied counterpoint at Naples with Francesco Durante and Girolamo Abos. By 1758 he was Konzertmeister of the prince-bishop's orchestra. In 1768 Clemens Wenzeslaus, Elector of Trier, succeeded to the bishopric of Augsburg and took over the orchestra, moving some of its personnel to Ehrenbreitstein, his electoral residence; Lang was made Konzertmeister there in 1769 and remained even after the elector moved across the Rhine into the new palace at Koblenz in 1786. Lang's official duties included leading the strings and advising the elector's Musikintendant, Baron von Thünnefeld, on orchestral administration. In 1794 the elector abandoned both his residences because of the advancing French Republican forces, but Lang remained at Ehrenbreitstein. He was buried there in the Kreuzkirche.

Lang's orchestral output consists mainly of keyboard concertos and symphonies. One of his early concertos has been erroneously attributed to Haydn and several symphonies to J.C. Bach and others. Among his instrumental pieces are many ensemble sonatas with obbligato keyboard and quartets with obbligato flute. Lang's larger vocal works are mostly sacred, including masses, litanies and Te Deum settings. The stylistic evolution of the keyboard concertos shows the changing musical taste at Koblenz between 1769 and 1784; particularly after 1775 greater textural flexibility, slower harmonic rhythm, and more broadly arched melodies become clearly characteristic. A parallel development occurred in the symphonies (mostly from the late 1750s and 1760s), which were praised by a correspondent to Baron von Eschstruth's Musikalische Bibliothek (5 June 1784) as 'fluent and in accord with the rules'.

Lang, Josephine (Caroline) (b Munich, 14 March 1815; d Tübingen, 2 Dec 1880). German composer. She was first taught music by her mother, and made her début at the age of 11, playing a set of piano variations by Henri Herz. Her earliest compositions date from 1828. In 1830 she met Mendelssohn, who wrote a glowing report to his family (letter of 6 October 1831). He gave her lessons in theory and recommended that she study in Berlin, but Lang's father decided against it. Mendelssohn remained enthusiastic about Lang, and his opinion was shared by his sister Fanny (letter of 13 July 1841). During the 1830s Lang taught singing and the piano, sang in the Königliche Vokalkapelle and composed. In 1837 Schumann praised her music in a review of Das Traumbild op.28 no.1. Her courtship by her future husband, the poet Christian Reinhold Köstlin, led to an outpouring of lieder in the summer of 1840, but after their marriage in 1842 she wrote only a few works. 14 years later, when Köstlin died, Lang turned with renewed zeal to composition, and with the help of friends, notably Ferdinand Hiller, she found publishers. Of her 46 published opus numbers, almost all are lieder. In 1882 Breitkopf & Härtel issued a posthumous collection of 40 lieder, many previously unpublished. Lang identified strongly with her compositions, declaring them 'my diary'. Most of her songs, which number approximately 150, deal with love or nature. Her melodies are often daring and show the insight of a singer, while the accompaniments usually function independently. Her son Heinrich Adolf Köstlin (b Tübingen, 4 Sept 1846; d Cannstatt, 4 June 1907), was a theologian who wrote on the history of music, especially evangelical church music, and left a memoir of his mother.

Lang, K(athryn) D(awn) [lang, k d] (b Edmonton, AL, 2 Nov 1961). Canadian singer-songwriter. Her professional name is k d lang. She learnt the piano and the guitar as a child, and began songwriting in her early teens. Having studied music at Red Deer College, Alberta, she found her métier when she was cast in Country Chorale (1982), a 1950s-style musical. The writer Raymond Storey suggested that Patsy Cline might be a suitable model for her character. Lang had never heard of her but was soon obsessed. In the following years, she presented herself as a country punk whose androgynous image defied category. The album A Truly Western Experience (Homestead, 1984) attracted a cult following in Canada and a gig in 1985 at the Bottom Line, New York, finally secured a contract with Sire Records. Though she was unhappy with the resulting album, Angel with a Lariat (1987), it found a ready audience with the fans of Nanci Griffith and Lyle Lovett, who were then re-inventing the country music sound.

She achieved more widespread success with her next album, Shadowland (1988), which was recorded in Nashville and produced by Owen Bradley, creator of the Nashville sound. It combined the sultry sounds of cabaret and old-style country to become a crossover success. Even so, in the USA Lang's music was allowed little radio exposure and it was the Canadian Country Music Association that was the first to honour her. She subsequently won two Grammy awards for Crying (1987), a duet with Roy Orbison, and Absolute Torch and Twang (1989), but received no recognition from Nashville. The latter was recorded in Vancouver with her own choice of musicians and featured a skilful blend of old and new country with elements of jazz, Latin and 1950s pop, and the recurring influence of Cline. Ingénue (1992) was Lang's international breakthrough: a polished hybrid of jazz, pop and country, the album won a cluster of awards. Introspective and melancholic, it redefined k d lang and, in dealing with the subject of unrequited love, she was finally able to acknowledge her sexuality. As the first openly lesbian pop icon the announcement propelled her career to new heights. Her 1997 release, Drag, a collection of songs concerned with smoking, showed a return to those qualities that brought her initial success: long controlled phrases, the use of wide dynamic range and a direct and intense tone manipulated with great sensitivity.

LIZ THOMSON

Lang, Margaret Ruthven (b Boston, 27 Nov 1867; d Boston, 30 May 1972). American composer. She studied the piano and composition with her father, Benjamin Johnson Lang, and wrote her first works at the age of 12. She studied the violin with Louis Schmidt in Boston, continuing with Franz Drechsler and Ludwig Abel in Munich (1886–7), where she also studied counterpoint and fugue with Victor Gluth. On her return to Boston she worked on orchestration with George Chadwick. Her father continued to act as her teacher and mentor: Lang submitted for publication only those works that pleased him and, as conductor of the Cecilia and Apollo Clubs, he was regularly able to include his daughter's works in his programmes.

The first works by Lang to receive public performance were five songs included in a Boston recital by Myron W. Whitney on 14 December 1887, which received favourable reviews from local critics. Her song Ojalá was performed at a concert of representative American works given at the Trocadéro during the Paris Exposition of 1889; this established her reputation, and the same song was repeated at the inauguration of the Lincoln Concert Hall in Washington, DC, on 26 March 1890. The soprano Mrs Gerrit Smith gave the first of many concerts solely of works by Lang in New York two years later. Many leading singers performed Lang's songs including Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who favoured An Irish Love Song as an encore.

Lang was the first woman in the USA to have a work played by a major orchestra. On 7 April 1893 the Boston SO under Nikisch gave the première of her Dramatic Overture op.12. The same year her overture Witichis op.10 received three performances at the World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, conducted by Theodore Thomas and Max Bendix. The Ballade op.36 received its première on 14 March 1901 at the Women in Music Grand Concert given by the Baltimore SO. Wind op.53 was commissioned by Victor Harris for his St Cecilia Club of New York, and was regularly included in the group's programmes. Lang's last work appeared in 1919. She remained interested in new music, however, and continued to attend concerts of the Boston SO, which gave a concert in honour of her 100th birthday.

Unlike her contemporaries, Lang made use of a restrained harmonic vocabulary with judicious use of dissonance. A number of her works draw on Scottish and Irish elements (for example, the Six Scotch Songs and An Irish Mother's Lullaby). Others contain onomatopoeic effects and humour (The Jumblies). Many, such as Day is Gone, are strophic and brief; the Nonsense Rhymes are witty miniatures. Several works, including Wind, explore Impressionist sonorities within a tonal frame. Manuscripts by Lang, together with printed music and correspondence, are in the Arthur P. Schmidt Collection at the Library of Congress; the Boston Public Library has multiple family scrapbooks, as well as printed music.

ADRIENNE FRIED BLOCK

Lang, Paul Henry [Láng, Pál] (b Budapest, 28 Aug 1901; d Lakeville, CT, 21 Sept 1991). American musicologist of Hungarian birth. He studied at the Budapest Academy of Music, graduating in 1922. His teachers there were Kodály (composition), Hans Koessler (counterpoint), Leó Weiner (chamber music) and Wieschendorf (bassoon). On leaving the academy he was appointed assistant conductor at the Budapest Opera and played the bassoon in several orchestras. In 1924, encouraged by Kodály and Bartók, he decided to study musicology. As Budapest did not offer courses in this field he enrolled at the University of Heidelberg, where he became a pupil of Kroyer; he also studied comparative literature with Ernst R. Curtius and Friedrich Gundolf. The last two were responsible for starting him on the path of cultural history which he followed throughout his career. In the autumn of the same year he transferred to the Sorbonne, from which he received a degree in literature (1928); his chief teachers were Pirro (musicology), Henri Focillon (art history), Fernand Baldensperger, Félix Gaiffe (literature) and Victor Basch (aesthetics). During his four years in Paris, Lang also played the bassoon professionally, conducted choral societies, served as accompanist to singers and assisted Prunières in editing the Revue musicale. In the spring of 1928 he was named a Junior Scholar to the United States by the Rockefeller Foundation and taught music for a year at Vassar College (1930–31). This was followed by an appointment to Wells College (1931–3), and while teaching there he worked on a doctoral dissertation in French literature and philology (A Literary History of French Opera, 1934) under James Frederick Mason at Cornell University. He also continued his studies in musicology with Kinkeldey.

Lang, who became an American citizen in 1934, took an active and influential part in the musical life of his adopted country. In 1933 he began to teach at Columbia University, where from 1939 to 1969 he was full professor of musicology and trained several generations of musical scholars. His monumental Music in Western Civilization (1941) is one of the outstanding 20th-century contributions to cultural history and probably his major achievement. In it he lucidly expounded the history of music by placing it firmly in its artistic, social and political contexts. As editor of the Musical Quarterly (1945–73) he continued the development of this journal of international importance with literary as well as scholarly contributions, and he opened its pages to contemporary music, notably in the feature called 'Current Chronicle'. He also served from 1954 to 1963 as chief music critic of the New York Herald Tribune and brought to this task a historical knowledge rare in American journalism. He held many positions of importance: in 1934 he was one of the founders of the American Musicological Society and from 1955 to 1958 president of the International Musicological Society. He received degrees in music and letters from Temple and Northwestern universities, the University of Western Ontario and the New England Conservatory of Music; he was also a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Lang, Philip (Emil) J(oseph) (b 17 April 1911; d 22 Feb 1986). American orchestrator, arranger and composer. He studied at Ithaca College (1931) and then the Juilliard Graduate School. At WOR radio Lang worked under the music director Alfred Wallenstein and as arranger and assistant conductor for Morton Gould's radio programmes. During World War II he was an ensign in charge of music for the US Maritime Service. Lang's earliest theatre orchestrations include those for Gould's Billion Dollar Baby (1945) and Berlin's Annie Get Your Gun (1946). The following two decades were divided between the specialized craft of theatre scoring and his composing or arranging for America's educational market. Among the most successful of his dozens of Broadway credits are High Button Shoes (composer: Styne, 1947), Can-Can (Porter, 1953), My Fair Lady (Loewe, 1956), Camelot (Loewe, 1960), Hello Dolly! (Herman, 1964) and Mame (Herman, 1966). The variety of Lang's Broadway assignments, both operetta-flavoured and splashy, uninhibited shows, testifies to his versatility. His work with Robert Russell Bennett on Loewe's My Fair Lady and Camelot also shows a keen ability to obtain a unified style while on a collaborative assignment.

With Herb Martin, Lang completed a musical of his own, Places, Please (pubd. Chicago, 1978). He also helped to score the film version of Hello Dolly! and the soundtracks for The Molly Maguires and The Night They Raided Minsky's. Among his postwar contributions to the growing American school band movement were many transcriptions, notably of orchestral works by Gould and Leroy Anderson, along with a few original pieces including Trumpet and Drum (1950) and Circus Time (1950), both for wind band. His Scoring for the Band (New York, 1950) is a succinct and valuable study of American concert-band instrumentation and writing in the mid-twentieth century.

He joined the Covent Garden chorus in 1948, making his solo début in 1950 as the Nightwatchman (The Olympians) in Manchester. Graduating to principal roles, he created Lieutenant Ratcliffe in Billy Budd (1951), the Recorder of Norwich in Gloriana (1953), the He-Ancient in The Midsummer Marriage (1955) and the Doctor in We Come to the River (1976). Langdon was a notable Claggart (Billy Budd) in a production for television and on Britten's recording. He had a large, rather dry-toned voice, equally suitable to comic or tragic parts. On retiring from the stage he became director of the National Opera Studio (1978–86). His autobiography, Notes from a Low Singer, was published in 1982.

ALAN BLYTH

Langdon, Richard (b Exeter, *c*1729; d Exeter, 8 Sept 1803). English organist and composer. He came of a family long connected with the music of Exeter Cathedral, and was probably the grandson of Tobias Langdon, a priest vicar-choral there. He himself became lay vicar-choral and organist of Exeter Cathedral in June 1753 and also Master of the Choristers in 1762. In 1761 he took the Oxford degree of BMus. He resigned his posts at Exeter in October 1777 and in November of that year was appointed organist of Ely Cathedral, moving thence to Bristol Cathedral in 1778 and to Armagh Cathedral in 1782. He left Armagh in poor health in 1794 and appears to have retired to Exeter, where he died. In June 1784 one Richard Langdon was appointed organist of Peterborough Cathedral but it is apparent that he did not take up duty there. (W. Shaw: The Succession of Organists, Oxford, 1991)

Lange, Aloysia. German soprano. See WEBER family, (4).

Lange, de. Dutch family of musicians.

(1) Samuel de Lange (i) (b Rotterdam, 9 June 1811; d Rotterdam, 15 May 1884). Organist and composer. He studied the organ and piano with Pruys and J.B. van Bree and from 1827 was organist of several Rotterdam churches, where he became celebrated for his recital series. From 1844 he taught at the newly founded school of the Rotterdam section of Toonkunst. His compositions, in the style of Mendelssohn, are mainly for the organ and include sonatas, fantasias, variations and transcriptions.

(2) Samuel de Lange (ii) (b Rotterdam, 22 Feb 1840; d Stuttgart, 7 July 1911). Organist and composer, son of (1) Samuel de Lange (i). After early studies with his father, J.F. Dupont and Verhulst, he took organ lessons in Vienna in 1859 from Winterberger, a Liszt pupil, while on a concert tour with his younger brother. In Lemberg (L'viv) he taught at the conservatory, where he also studied the piano with Karol Mikuli. The brothers returned in 1862 to Rotterdam where Samuel was appointed teacher at the Toonkunst music school, director of the Toonkunst choir and organist of the Waalse Kerk. He played an influential part in the Dutch Bach renaissance, organizing and conducting orchestral concerts as well as playing keyboard instruments in solo and chamber music; he also promoted the organ works of Muffat, Frescobaldi, Liszt and Brahms. From 1877 to 1884 he lived in Cologne, where he taught the organ at the conservatory and was also a choral conductor. On returning to the Netherlands he became director of the Toonkunst music school of The Hague; in 1893 he left to teach at the Stuttgart Conservatory, which he directed from 1900 to 1908. He composed in a wide range of genres, and also published an edition of Muffat's Apparatus musico-organisticus (Leipzig, 1888).

(3) Daniël de Lange (b Rotterdam, 11 July 1841; d Point Loma, CA, 31 Jan 1918). Composer, educationist and writer on music, son of (1) Samuel de Lange (i). He studied the cello with A.F. Servais at the Brussels Conservatory, where he was also in Berthold Damcke's composition class. From 1858 he toured eastern Europe with his brother, teaching the cello at the conservatory in Lemberg (L'viv), 1860–62. He returned to Rotterdam in 1862 and taught at the Toonkunst music school. He lived in Paris as an organist and choir conductor from 1864 to 1870, meeting Berlioz, Bizet, Lalo and Massenet, then settled in Amsterdam as a teacher and orchestra and choir conductor. In 1873 he established a music school at Zaandam and from 1875 to 1911 directed the Leiden section of Toonkunst; he sat on the society's general committee (1876–1908) and served on the board of the Vereeniging voor Noord Nederlands Muziekgeschiedenis (1881–1913). From 1884 he taught at the Amsterdam Conservatory (of which he was a co-founder), succeeding Frans Coenen as director (1895–1913). In 1914 he became director of the music department of the Isis Conservatory in Point Loma, California.

De Lange's chief importance lies in his championship of early Renaissance polyphony. In 1881 he founded in Amsterdam a choir of ten soloists with which he toured the Netherlands. In 1885 he gave a concert at the International Inventions Exhibition in London, and in 1892 he was invited to Vienna where he directed another a cappella choir, this time with 18 soloists, at the Internationale Ausstellung für Musik- und Theaterwesen. A successful tour of western Europe followed. He also promoted contemporary and Asian music. From 1875 to 1913 he wrote music criticism for the newspaper Het nieuws van den dag. His editions include the doubtful St Matthew Passion ascribed to Obrecht (UVNM, xviii, 1894). In his compositions de Lange combined progressive tendencies with echoes of early polyphonic techniques.

JAN TEN BOKUM

Lange, Francisco [Franz] Curt [Kurt] (b Eilenburg, 12 Dec 1903; d Montevideo, 3 May 1997). Uruguayan musicologist of German origin. He studied at Leipzig, Berlin, Munich and Bonn universities, taking an architect's diploma at Munich (1927) and the doctorate at Bonn (1929) with a dissertation on the polyphony of the Netherlands; his teachers included Nikisch, Sandberger, Bücken, van den Borren, Oeser, Hornbostel and Sachs. In 1930 the Uruguayan government invited him to help organize the country's musical life and he settled in Montevideo, adopting Uruguayan citizenship and working energetically on a variety of projects. He was a founder of the State Broadcasting System (SODRE) and the State Record Library, and was SODRE's music adviser (1930–48); he introduced musicological studies at the Instituto de Estudios Superiores (1933), and in Montevideo started the 'Americanismo musical' movement to promote music and musicians of the Americas: the first Ibero-American Music Festival (Bogotá, 1938) and Inter-American Conference in the Field of Music (Washington DC, 1939) were organized under its auspices. For several years he worked on music organization and education in Argentina, Brazil, Peru and Colombia. In 1935 he began to publish the Boletín latino-americano de música, dealing with the various musical traditions of the Americas. He also founded the Instituto Interamericano de Musicología (1938) at Montevideo, which published some 66 works by Latin American composers under the auspices of Editorial Cooperativa Interamericana de Compositores (1941–56). In connection with this, he published with Hans J. Koellreutter the short-lived review Música viva (Rio de Janeiro, 1940–41), and under the institute's auspices and in collaboration with Juan Bautista Plaza the Archivo de música colonial venezolana (1941–2), the first organized Latin American historical collection (12 volumes). In 1948 Lange was invited to establish the department of musicology at the National University of Cuyo in Mendoza, Argentina, where he founded and edited the Revista de estudios musicales (1949–56) and a series of contemporary Latin American music.

Lange's main contribution to musicological research was his extensive exploration of colonial archives in Argentina and Brazil, supported by grants from over 20 foundations and governments. In Minas Gerais he discovered a particularly rich 18th-century musical culture, developed exclusively by mulattos, and edited many scores of its religious music for his Monumenta Musicae Brasiliae; further volumes of valuable documentation resulted from his work on Brazilian archives. This research was amplified by further study in Spain and Portugal. Between 1933 and 1970 he organized hundreds of concerts of this music throughout South America, the USA and Europe, and thus contributed more than any other individual to the dissemination of Latin American music. He was also active in disseminating European and North American culture in South America: he mounted many concerts of new music from the USA in Montevideo and Rio de Janeiro, and to extend Latin American knowledge of international bibliography translated numerous studies into Spanish. As a visiting lecturer he taught throughout Europe and the USA, and he was the Latin American representative of most European and North American musicological organizations. In 1985 the state conferred on him the Gabriela Mistral Prize.

GERARD BÉHAGUE

Lange, Gregor [Langius, Hieronymus Gregorius] (b Havelberg, Brandenburg, *c*1540; d Breslau [now Wrocław], ? 1 May 1587). German composer. He matriculated at the University of Frankfurt an der Oder in 1573 and in 1574 became the university Kantor. He appears to have contracted an incurable disease about 1580, since shortly afterwards he was obliged to relinquish his position; in the last dedication he wrote, in 1585, he stated that his hands and feet were completely paralysed. From 1583 he lived at Breslau, where he was supported by the town council; he spent the final period of his life in the Hieronymus Hospital there.

Lange was highly esteemed by his contemporaries, who ranked him with Lassus and Lechner, and his reputation endured until the 19th century. The influence of Lassus is evident in the swiftly developing structures and penchant for modulation in Lange's music; the motet Vae misero mihi from the 1584 collection, for example, is remarkable for its unusual chromatic modulations. In other respects, however, his work was outmoded, particularly in its rapid alteration of vocal groupings and the brevity of its themes. His Latin motets, 45 of which were published in his collections of 1580 and 1584, enjoyed considerable favour. His three-voice German songs are less attractive than those of Regnart, for they are somewhat stiff and lacking in melody, but they were popular enough for the first book (1584) to be reprinted four times and the second (1586) twice before the end of the 16th century; in 1615 they reappeared with sacred texts by Henning Dedekind and in arrangements for five voices by Christoph Demantius that are of greater musical merit.

BERNHARD STOCKMANN

Langeleik. Fretted Norwegian box zither. It resembles the Scheitholt depicted by Praetorius (Theatrum instrumentorum, 1620), having only one melody string and three to seven drone strings. An instrument dated 1524 is known from the Gjøvik district, and there are several literary references to the langeleik dating from about 1600. It was commonly used for domestic rural music-making from this time until the mid-19th century. Its use was fairly widespread, the greatest number of old instruments being found in Telemark and Oppland. The Valdres district still has an unbroken tradition of langeleik playing, and there has been a strong revival in the Gjøvik district (see NORWAY, fig.2).

Older instruments are hollowed out from one piece of wood; the newer instruments from Valdres are made as boxes, often with different kinds of wood used for the top, sides and bottom. The playing technique differs considerably from that of similar instruments outside Norway: the middle three fingers of the left hand stop the melody string and also rapidly strike (on ascending) and pluck (on descending) the notes between the rhythmic plectrum strokes of the right hand. The melodic idiosyncrasies of langeleik music may be related to this technique (see Ledang, 1974). Modern instruments have the frets placed to produce a major scale; a few instruments are made with movable frets to produce other intervals. On early specimens, however, it is difficult to establish common patterns in the spacing of the frets, and the old instruments have featured in research related to scale and mode in Norwegian traditional music. Eggen (1923) attempted an evaluation of langeleik scales. Sevåg (1974), using a greater number of early instruments, concluded that a heptatonic scale structure with a relatively fixed framework of tonic, 5th and octave can be abstracted. Other intervals vary as much as 60 cents.

REIDAR SEVÅG/TELLEF KVIFTE

Lange-Müller, Peter Erasmus (b Frederiksberg, 1 Dec 1850; d Copenhagen, 26 Feb 1926). Danish composer. He came from a wealthy and musical family of scientists, clergymen and academics and was taught the piano from an early age by Gottfred Matthison-Hansen. After leaving school in 1870 he enrolled at Copenhagen University (to read political science) and at the conservatory, where he was taught the piano by Edmund Neupert, but ill-health soon forced him to give up his studies. Throughout his life he suffered from constant headaches, which affected both his personal relations and his musical development. He was largely self-taught, and his isolation meant that he could more readily develop the original and untraditional characteristics of his music; he withdrew from official musical life except between 1879 and 1883, when he was conductor of the Koncertforening that he had helped to found. Shortly after his marriage in 1892 he moved to a beautiful country estate in northern Zealand, and the surroundings there deeply influenced his creative work.

Lange-Müller was a Romantic by temperament and artistic inclination. His style was strongly influenced by the music of his countrymen Hartmann and Heise and by that of Schumann, but he evolved an individual late Romantic style built around emotionally concentrated tonal effects on a dark harmonic background, reminiscent of Brahms and contemporary French developments – an expression of nostalgia that was not directly followed up in Danish music. His substantial output is dominated by vocal music. The Piano Trio op.53 is one of his best instrumental pieces, but his lack of technical training becomes apparent in the sometimes awkward orchestration of his larger works. As a composer of songs he had no equal among his Danish contemporaries; his wide choice of texts and acute sensitivity to the mood of each poem enabled him to create a vocal style whose subtlety was without precedent in Danish music. He found a source of sympathetic inspiration in his friend, the poet Thor Lange, whose varied imagery and reworkings of Russian and other Slav folk poetry influenced Lange-Müller's musical expression. He hoped for success as a composer of opera, as is shown by his numerous efforts in that genre, but his most ambitious work, the opera Vikingeblod, was also his greatest disappointment; the critics found the style and subject outdated, and this judgment may partly account for the decline in his output after 1900 and its virtual cessation by 1910. By that time, however, his songs with piano and works such as the Madonnasange op.65 and the music for Der var engang ('Once upon a time') op.25 had secured the widespread acceptance and popularity of his music. The younger generation of Danish composers regarded him with respect and veneration.

NIELS MARTIN JENSEN

Langer [née Knauth], Susanne Katherina (b New York, 20 Dec 1895; d Old Lyme, CT, 17 July 1985). American philosopher. After studying philosophy at Radcliffe College (PhD 1926) and (briefly) at the University of Vienna, she taught at various institutions between 1927 and 1954, when she was appointed professor at Connecticut College. She remained there as a research scholar after her retirement in 1962.

Between 1940 and 1960 Langer's publications centred on a philosophy of art derived from a theory of musical meaning in which music played an important role. She responded to trends she observed in Ernst Cassirer's Philosophie der symbolischen Formen (Berlin, 1928–9), Charles Peirce's theory of signs, Alfred North Whitehead's Symbolism, its Meaning and Effect (Charlottesville, VA, 1927/R) and Wittgenstein's Tractatus logico-philosophicus (London, 1922/R; Gero. orig. in Annalen der Naturphilosophie, xiv, 1921). Noting their thematic connection, she declared the study of symbolism a 'New Key' in the thought of her era (1942). In developing her own philosophy of symbols, Langer uses music as paradigm of a symbol system whose symbols are presentational rather than discursive, having meaning but not the power to assert anything about states-of-affairs in the world. She does so in order to counter Wittgenstein, who denied 'meaning' to non-discursive (or 'non-propositional') forms, and viewed the excluded artistic forms of verbal utterances as 'expressive', in the sense that a scream of pain might be. A 'presentational symbol', she argued, need not be discursive in order to convey a meaning, and its lack of propositional content need not be taken as a symptom of the emotionally cathartic. Music presents a content which neither expresses an emotional state felt by the composer, nor elicits an emotional response in the hearer. Instead, it is a symbolic 'formulation and representation of emotions, moods, mental tensions and resolutions – a "logical picture" of sentient, responsive life'. Music's capacity for presenting emotional states is attributed to its dynamic shape, or patterns of tension and resolution, which Langer takes to be correlated with those of emotional life. Music is not, however, limited to the presentation of familiar states, but 'articulates subtle complexes of feeling that language cannot even name' calling for a response of reflective 'insight' (1942, pp.222–3).

Langer extended her aesthetics to become a philosophy of mind (1967–72). The strength of her position lies in its challenge to philosophies which privilege the linguistic over other modes of semiotic activity, and the propositional over other modes of mental life, including feeling. Its weakness lies in a lack of precision in the basic definition of terms ('symbol' in Langer's scheme would more usually be referred to as 'icon' in current semiotics) and the absence of a precise working-out of the supposed correlation between the presentational shapes of music and those of emotional life.

F.E. SPARSHOTT/NAOMI CUMMING

Langford, Gordon (Maris Colman) [Colman, Gordon Maris] (b Edgware, 11 May 1930). English arranger, composer and pianist. He was an accomplished pianist from childhood, playing a Mozart concerto in a public concert at the age of 11, and winning a Middlesex scholarship to the RAM where he also studied trombone. Early attempts at composition were influenced by Debussy and Ravel, and later by the Russian Romantics, Rachmaninoff and Skryabin. His first BBC broadcast as a pianist was in 1951 while serving with the Royal Artillery Band. By the 1960s, after a variety of engagements as both player and arranger, Langford had established himself as a respected pianist in concerts and on numerous broadcasts such as 'Music in the Air' and 'Friday Night is Music Night'. His reputation as an arranger and composer also grew steadily.

In 1971 he won an Ivor Novello Award for his march from the Colour Suite, and became more involved in brass band music. At the same time he was increasingly in demand to orchestrate West End musicals and feature films, and also contributed mood music to publishers' recorded music libraries. He has written many arrangements for the King's Singers and the Philip Jones Brass Ensemble. In 1994 the BBC commissioned Grand Fantasia on 'La bohème' for the centenary of the Proms, and in the same year he received the Gold Badge of Merit from the British Academy of Songwriters, Composers and Authors.

DAVID ADES

Langgaard, Rued [Rud] (Immanuel) (b Copenhagen, 28 July 1893; d Ribe, 10 July 1952). Danish composer and organist. His father, Siegfried Langgaard, was a piano teacher and composer, and his mother, Emma Foss, a pianist. He received early instruction from his parents, and was taught the organ and musical theory by private teachers, including C.F.E. Horneman (1903–7). At the age of 11 he made a remarkable début in Copenhagen as an organist and improviser, and in 1908 a performance of an early cantata, for soloists, chorus and orchestra, attracted attention. Between 1908 and 1913 he travelled regularly to Berlin with his parents; contacts there led to his hour-long Symphony no.1 (1908–11) being performed by the Berlin PO in 1913 in a concert devoted to his works. This was the greatest outward success of the composer's career; in Denmark the musical community regarded the highly productive but reserved and solitary composer with considerable scepticism. In 1921–3 Langgaard's symphonic works aroused some interest in Germany, where two of his most progressive compositions, Sfaerernes musik ('Music of the Spheres') (1916–18) and the Symphony no.6 (1919–20), were given their premières. But a true breakthrough failed to materialize, and after his opera Antikrist was turned down by the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen in 1925, he reacted sharply by turning his back on modernism and openly criticizing Danish musical life, not least Nielsen's significant aesthetic influence on it. He never gained sufficient sympathy for his music to establish himself in Danish musical life, becoming instead an isolated figure who developed a rigid and unhappy relationship of opposition to the musical authorities and the spirit of the time. His uncompromising view of music, coloured by religion and symbolism, did not concur with the anti-Romantic and sober attitude which became dominant in Denmark around 1930. He battled for many years to obtain a position as organist, and only in 1940 became cathedral organist in Ribe, far from the centre of Danish musical life in Copenhagen.

Collage-like features, expressive of desperation and fragmentation, and a preoccupation with visions of destruction make Langgaard's music distinctive, despite the often late Romantic and at times demonstratively retrospective nature of his musical language. He often went to extremes to achieve expressiveness, and his works frequently transcend traditional perceptions of musical form and temporal progression. His many pastiche-like compositions, seen purely in isolation, are of debatable artistic merit, but they have a place in his individual, symbolist universe. His works overall can be seen as a commentary on time, on the Classical-Romantic tradition and on the isolation of the composer.

Langgaard's vast output of more than 400 compositions falls into four phases. Up until 1916 his works were late Romantic in idiom, influenced by composers such as Liszt and Richard Strauss; between 1916 and 1924 late Romanticism, refined in sound, was mixed with expressive modernism, inspired in places by Nielsen but also anticipating Hindemith and Bartók. The principal works of this period are the Symphonies nos.4 and 6, Sfaerernes musik, Antikrist, Afgrundsmusik ('Music of the Abyss') for piano and the String Quartets nos.2 and 3. In a long intermediate phase (1925–45), Langgaard attempted to re-establish his Romantic point of departure, to 're-tell', as it were, music as he remembered it from his childhood about the turn of the century. He adopted a consciously 'anonymous' style which took the music of Wagner and Gade as its starting-point. The principal work in this period was the two-hour-long Messis (Høstens tid) ('Messis [Harvest Time]') for organ, which draws on the entire range of expression of the Romantic era. In the fourth and final phase, from about 1945 onwards, absurdity and fragmentation found their way into Langgaard's world, and the composer's desperation is expressed in works such as the nightmarish six-minute Symphony no.11 'Ixion' (1944–5). In the distinctive piano piece Le béguinage (1948–9), stylistic elements of Schumann, Debussy and salon music are combined with modernist effects in a collage-like mixture.

Only about half of Langgaard's output was performed during his lifetime, and most works only on a single occasion. The opera Antikrist, eight of his 16 symphonies and other major works were not performed until interest in his music was reawakened in about 1968. Sfaerernes musik in particular contributed towards this renewal of interest, since it anticipated the avant-garde music of the 1960s in both its compositional technique and its concentration on the spatial and purely sonorous aspects of the music. In the 1990s Langgaard's works and the symbolist musical world from which they emerged were again surveyed and discussed, and numerous recordings have helped provide a varied picture of the paradoxical and complex composer, confirming his position among the outsiders of the 20th century. His music, which has generated considerable scholarly interest, often radiates elemental creative power, making an immediate impression. Langgaard's art and his personal fate sets Danish musical history into relief, and in a wider perspective his works provide 'an inexhaustible source for the enrichment and renewal of the usual view of music', as the musical historian Godtfred Skjerne – the only one to do so in Langgaard's own time – was able to foresee in 1916.

BENDT VIINHOLT NIELSEN

Langhans, (Friedrich) Wilhelm (b Hamburg, 21 Sept 1832; d Berlin, 9 June 1892). German writer, composer and violinist. He showed an inclination to be a performer at an early age and was enrolled at the Leipzig Conservatory from 1849 to 1852, studying the violin with David and composition with Hauptmann and Richter. Subsequently he played in the Gewandhaus Orchestra, Leipzig, from 1852 to 1856, during which time he also took further violin instruction from Alard in Paris. He was appointed Konzertmeister at Düsseldorf in 1857; the following year he married Louise Japha, a pianist from Hamburg (and a pupil of the Schumanns) with whom he gave joint recitals. He was active as a violinist and teacher in Hamburg (1860), Paris (1863) and Heidelberg (1869), where he received the doctorate in 1871. He moved to Berlin in 1871, teaching music history and theory at Kullak's Neue Akademie der Tonkunst from 1874, then at Scharwenka's newly founded conservatory from 1881.

Langhans's published compositions, including the Concert Allegro for violin and orchestra, violin studies, a sonata, string quartet and songs, are mainly forgotten. His major contribution was as a writer on music: he was a critic for the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, a correspondent for the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the editor of the Berlin music journal Echo (1873–9) and a contributor to Mendel's Musikalisches Conversations-Lexikon. Many of his writings are coloured by his admiration for Wagner. He recommended reforms in music education, advocating that music be given a status comparable to that of other disciplines in the Gymnasium, and was a champion of academic freedom in the secondary educational system, which he felt should be run on similar lines to those of the university. His contribution to Italian music was recognized by honorary memberships in musical academies in Florence, Rome and Bologna.

GAYNOR G. JONES

Langhedul. Flemish family of organ builders. Active about 1475 to 1635, they were one of the prominent families in Ypres during that period, and particularly significant in the early development of the French Baroque organ.

Victor (d ?1513) was one of the great organ builders at the turn of the 16th century, as can be concluded from the importance of the churches for which he worked (Courtrai, Saint Omer and Lille). After his death his clients were taken over by Matthijs de Wulf [Matthieu le Leup] (fl 1515–22), husband of one of his four daughters.

Michiel the elder, Victor's son, went to England in his youth, probably to allow Matthijs de Wulf to work unhindered; while there he improved and enlarged the organ at Trinity Chapel, Salisbury Cathedral (1530–31). Apparently Michiel returned to Ypres after the early death of his brother-in-law and continued the family business from 1534 to *c*1570. His name is linked with a great number of organs, including many which he built new, though all are within the narrow geographical range of south-west Flanders and surroundings: Ypres, Courtrai (1534, 1546, 1570), Bruges (1535), Veurne (1536, 1557), Saint Omer (1546), Bergues (1548, 1557), Nieuwpoort (1553, 1557), Dunkirk (1555, 1559), Poperinghe (1569). And as very many village churches in the 16th century had organs, a large number in west Flanders must naturally be ascribed to Michiel. Towards the end of his life he was particularly occupied with the restoring of organs destroyed during the religious troubles of 1566.

Jan (d Ghent, 6 Feb 1592), son of Michiel the elder, was active at first in the same area (Courtrai, Ypres), but war, the temporary regime of the Calvinists and economic confusion forced him to move, in 1583 to Lille, and in 1585 to Paris. His Paris organ restorations (St Benoît, the Ste Chapelle, Couvent des Augustines, St Eustache) and the new instrument he built in St Jacques-de-la-Boucherie show several important innovations: a balanced plein jeu, a progressive Cornet of four, five and six ranks, and a rich complement of reed stops. He received the title 'Organ Builder to the King of France' for his work in the Ste Chapelle, part of the royal palace. Jan left Paris sometime after 15 October 1590 and returned to Ypres; his last works are found especially in Ghent and were produced in partnership with Guillames [Guillaume] (fl Ghent, 1590–95), probably his son. Jan is buried in the Dominican church, the only church in Ghent whose organ survived the religious uprisings.

Guillames' methods are especially known from a pair of plans for a new organ in St Baaf Cathedral, Ghent (*c*1590), which he submitted but which were not realized. They closely resemble the instruments constructed by his father in Paris.

Matthijs [Mattheus, Matthieu, Mateo] (b Ypres; d Brussels, 1635–6), son of Jan, was perhaps the most important organ builder of the family. It is likely that he was with his father during the latter's Paris years; when Jan decided to return to Flanders, Matthijs went to Spain. From 1592 to 1599 he was the organ tuner (templador) for the Spanish court. From mid-1599 to mid-1605 he was again in Paris, where his family's reputation brought him immediate work: restoration of organs in St Jean-en-Grève, the Cimetière des Innocents, Hôpital du St Esprit-en-Grève, St Benoît, Chapelle St Leu and St Jacques-de-la-Boucherie, and provision of a new Rückpositiv organ and a modernized great organ for St Eustache (1604–5). Matthijs's most important organ was the new one he built for St Gervais (1601–2), which provided the basis for the later instrument of the Couperin family. This organ still contains an amount of important pipework by Matthijs, including some with his signature.

It was Jan and Matthijs, together with CRESPIN CARLIER, who laid the groundwork for the classic French organ of the 17th and 18th centuries. In 1605 Matthijs returned to Ypres, from where he built the organ in Hondschoote (1611), the Rückpositiv of which is still preserved. About 1613 he settled in Brussels and became court organ builder to the Archdukes Albertus and Isabella. While there, he built organs in a wide radius including Saint Omer, Antwerp and Tongeren, as well as one for the Spanish court at Madrid.

Other family members are: Michiel the younger, son of Michiel the elder, resident of Ypres, organ builder and organist, mentioned in 1610 as organist at Hazebrouck; and two other Jans. One was choirmaster of Antwerp Cathedral about 1570. Another was city magistrate at Ypres, and though himself a Calvinist was able to save the organs of the main church there (certainly products of his family) from destruction during the Calvinist interregnum of 1578. He was a signatory of the Union of Utrecht (1579); after the restoration of Catholicism in 1584, he fled to England, where he died in Norwich.

Langius, Hieronymus Gregorius. See LANGE, GREGOR.

Langlais, Jean (b La Fontenelle, 15 Feb 1907; d Paris, 8 May 1991). French organist and composer. He studied at the Institution des Jeunes Aveugles in Paris with Blazy (piano), Mahaut (harmony) Marchal (organ). Marchal prepared him for Dupré's class at the Conservatoire, where he was, with Messiaen, one of Dukas' last composition pupils; he took a premier prix in organ (1930) and a second prix in composition (1934). Lessons with Tournemire during this period were decisive. In 1932 he was appointed organist of St Pierre-de-Montrouge; he also joined the staff at the blind school where he had studied, teaching composition and organ, and conducting the choir in Palestrina, Bach and Josquin. In 1945 he followed in the line of Franck and Tournemire as organist of Ste Clotilde, a position he held until 1987.

He made his first visit to the USA in 1952, and repeatedly returned for concerts (including more than 300 recitals) and teaching engagements until 1981. Many of his works have been written for America. His Solemn Mass 'Orbis factor' had its first performance in 1969 at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, DC, before an audience of around 7000. His earlier Mass 'Salve regina', though, was first sung in Notre Dame, Paris, at Christmas 1954.

As an organ composer, Langlais followed the tradition of Tournemire. A quarter of his works are based on Gregorian melodies, treated with great inventiveness and enhanced by rich polymodal harmonies. Almost all his music was intended to express his religious faith. From 1962 to 1975 he taught at the Schola Cantorum in Paris, and gained a reputation as one of the best teachers of improvisation in the world, drawing pupils from many countries.

XAVIER DARASSE/MARIE-LOUISE JAQUET-LANGLAIS

Langlé, Honoré (François Marie) (b Monaco, 1741; d Villiers-le-Bel, nr Paris, 20 Sept 1807). French composer, singing teacher and theorist. A scholarship from Prince Honoré III of Monaco paid for his musical education at the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini in Naples from 1756 to 1764. After managing the theatre and the noblemen's concerts in Genoa (1764–8), he made a career as a teacher and composer in Paris, where his first works were performed at the Concert Spirituel. Drawn by the theatre, he wrote several stage works, but only two of them were performed. Antiochus et Stratonice, a skilfully orchestrated work, shows early hints of Romanticism. The score of Corisandre demonstrates the composer's solid technique and characteristic style: highly coloured orchestration and an alternation of action scenes with poetic reflections. Langlé was appointed professor of singing at the Ecole Royale de Chant et de Déclamation at its founding in 1784 and kept his appointment through its reorganization in 1791 and again in 1795, when it became the Conservatoire. From about 1797 he also served as librarian there until his retirement to Villiers-le-Bel in 1802. During the early years of the Revolution he was an éditeurmusicien in the Parisian National Guard.

Langlé's compositions were far less successful than his theoretical and didactic works, through which he is largely remembered today. He had a receptive mind and wide knowledge which led him to be nicknamed 'the Fontenelle of music'.

PAULE DRUILHE

Langreder, Martin (b Hildesheim; d Suben am Inn, Upper Austria, before 1602). German writer of contrafacta. He was a canon regular at the Augustinian canonry at Suben. He is known by a five-voice occasional motet, published in Passau in 1602, and by seven six-part Magnificat settings, all of them contrafacta, published by MICHAEL HERRER in his Canticum gloriosae deiparae Virginis Mariae ... super varia (ut vocant) madrigalia (Passau, 1602). Herrer explained that he had taken them from the 'vast treasure' of contrafacta that Langreder had left behind at his sudden death. He listed the titles but not the composers of the models: Mentr'io compai contento, Leggiadrissima, Voi ch'ascoltate, Nel più fiorito aprile, Un pastor, Tiridola, non dormire and Exaudiat te Dominus.

HORST LEUCHTMANN

Langridge, Philip (Gordon) (b Hawkhurst, Kent, 16 Dec 1939). English tenor. From 1958 he studied the violin at the RAM, playing professionally for a short period until 1964; in 1962 he began singing lessons with Bruce Boyce, continuing later with Celia Bizony. One of the most versatile British singers of the day, he has a large concert repertory that extends from Monteverdi and the 18th- and 19th-century oratorios to first performances of works by Bennett, Goehr, Holliger, Lutyens and Milner. But it is as a singing-actor of extraordinarily wide range that he has become internationally celebrated. Whether in operas by contemporary composers (Birtwistle and Tippett among many others), those of the postwar period (he has given memorable accounts of Britten's Grimes, Vere, Quint and, finest of all, Aschenbach) or others stretching back to the beginnings of the medium, Langridge has consistently revealed an acuity of stylistic understanding and a rare directness of dramatic delivery. His voice, individual rather than beautiful and tending to lack power and ring at the top of its compass, has nevertheless served him in the dramatic tenor roles of Janáček (Zivný in Osud, Laca in Jenůfa, Gregor in The Makropulos Affair) as impressively as it has in Rameau, Handel, Mozart (notably Don Ottavio and Idomeneus, both of which he has sung at Glyndebourne), Berlioz, Musorgsky, Schoenberg and Stravinsky. The same intelligence, natural musicianship and finely focussed diction have shed light on the song repertory. Langridge's many recordings include Peter Grimes, The Rake's Progress, Aaron in Moses und Aron (the role of his Salzburg début in 1987), Osud, lieder by Schubert and several outstanding discs of English song. He was made a CBE in 1994. He is married to the mezzo-soprano Ann Murray.

Langue des durées. French method of teaching rhythmic notation to beginners. It was introduced by Aimé Paris (1798–1866) as part of the GALIN-PARIS-CHEVÉ METHOD of teaching sight-singing. The method gives to notes and groups of notes names which, when spoken aloud, reproduce the rhythmic effects concerned (see illustration). The system was later adapted for English use Langwill, Lyndesay G(raham) (b Portobello, Midlothian, 19 March 1897; d Edinburgh, 1 Sept 1983). Scottish organologist. He studied at the University of Edinburgh and was by profession a chartered accountant. His lifelong interest in music centred first on the cello, which he began to play when he was 14, and then on the bassoon, which he took up in 1931 and of which he wrote a standard history. He also studied the stock-and-horn, waits and the barrel organ. His main contribution to organology, by which he became known internationally, was his pioneering An Index of Musical Wind-Instrument Makers (1960), a reference tool intended to assist in the identification, dating and evaluation of early woodwind and brass instruments. The work was begun in 1941 in the form of typescripts that were circulated to his friends and known as 'Langwill's Lists'; it subsequently appeared in six editions, which were published over a period of twenty years. In 1982 Langwill entrusted its future to Waterhouse, transferring to him for his lifetime the valuable archive of manuscript and printed material amassed over half a century, which he bequeathed to Edinburgh University. His other publications include contributions to various musical dictionaries and journals. He was a founder member of the Galpin Society and its treasurer until 1968. Involved for many years in a number of charitable fields, he was awarded the OBE (1969) for his services to animal welfare and an honorary MA by the University of Edinburgh (1964).

WILLIAM WATERHOUSE

Lanier [Laniere, Laneare, Laneer, Lanyer, Lenear etc.]. English family of musicians of French descent. John (i) (d 29 Nov 1572) and Nicholas (i) (d 1612) came originally from Rouen but settled in London in 1561, becoming musicians to Queen Elizabeth. Nicholas was the father of at least 11 children: John (ii) (d 1616), Alfonso (d 1613), Andrea (d 1660), Clement (d 1661), Innocent (d 1625) and Jerome (d 1657), all of whom were wind players in the royal band, and five daughters, two at least of whom were married to musicians – Katherine to Daniel Farrant and Ellen to Alfonso Ferrabosco (ii). Of this generation John (ii) had seven children who survived to maturity, including (1) John Lanier (iii) and (2) Nicholas Lanier (ii). Clement had nine children and Jerome eleven, one of whom, William (1618–*c*1660), served in the royal music. Andrea had eight children; a son, Thomas (1633–*c*1686), was in the royal band, as was Henry (d 1633), the son of Alfonso. (For further details see Grove5 suppl., and Wilson).

(1) John Lanier (iii) (d ?London, before 5 April 1650). Tenor and composer. He served as musician for the lutes and voices in the King's Musick from 1625 until the court broke up in the 1640s, although he continued to receive occasional payments up to 1650. Almost certainly he was the John Lanier described as one of the courtier Endymion Porter's servants in March 1639. He sang the part of Irene in Shirley's Triumph of Peace (1634) and is mentioned in Richard Lovelace's Lucasta (1649) as having set two of the songs, including To Lucasta, Going to the Warres ('Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind'). Neither these nor any others appear to have survived.

(2) Nicholas Lanier (ii) (b London, bap. 10 Sept 1588; d Greenwich, London, bur. 24 Feb 1666). Composer, singer, lutenist and artist, brother of (1) John Lanier (iii). As a child he was no doubt surrounded by music in his family, but he was indentured to the Earl of Salisbury for a period up to 1607 and his name occurs in the Cecil family and estate papers at Hatfield House as a recipient of various payments between 1605 and 1613, including a salary of £20 a year from 1608. He also acted as a messenger on behalf of the government, carrying letters to Paris in March 1610 and to Venice in February 1611, the latter perhaps in conjunction with a journey to Italy with William, Viscount Cranborne, who wrote to his father, the Earl of Salisbury, asking for Lanier to accompany him 'by reason of a desire I have to learn on the viol while I am there'. Connections and responsibilities such as these must have been valuable to Lanier at the start of his career. Although he was not appointed to the King's Musick as a lutenist until 1616, he had already made his mark at court, for in 1613 he composed and sang the song Bring away this sacred tree in Campion's masque for the marriage of Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, and Lady Frances Howard.

Lanier composed the music for Ben Jonson's masque Lovers Made Men (1617) and in doing so was described by Jonson in the printed text of 1640 as introducing 'stylo recitativo' into England; Jonson also reported that the masque was sung throughout. In the absence of the music these claims, made long after the performance of the work, must be accepted guardedly. Lanier also sang in the masque and designed the scenery. He wrote music for three further masques by Jonson: The Vision of Delight (1617), The Gypsies Metamorphos'd (1621) with Robert Johnson, and The Masque of Augurs (1622) with Alfonso Ferrabosco (ii).

At the accession of Charles I in 1625 Lanier was appointed the first ever Master of the King's Musick, at a salary of £200 (with livery of £16 2s.6d.). He continued to receive £40 a year as a lutenist, plus additional livery. Early in the new reign, his knowledge of painting, his reputation as a connoisseur and, above all, his trustworthiness as a courtier, induced Charles and the Duke of Buckingham to send him to Italy to buy pictures. He seems to have made three visits between 1625 and 1628, arranging, with the help of Daniel Nys in Venice, for the purchase of the Duke of Mantua's collection at a cost of more than £25,000. Some of these pictures are still in the royal collection at Hampton Court and elsewhere, but the rest were dispersed during the Commonwealth period; about half are probably still identifiable (a tentative list is given by Spink in ML, 1959). In addition he bought many master drawings; dozens survive bearing his mark (a small star), 34 of them at Windsor Castle, although many have disappeared.

On 6 February 1629 Lanier was arrested with his brother John and uncles Andrea, Clement and Jerome for disorderly behaviour in the street; the affair caused quite a stir, and an angry exchange of letters between the City and the court ensued. In 1630 he set to music A Pastorall upon the birth of Prince Charles by Herrick ('Good day, Mirtillo') which is, unfortunately, lost. In 1646 he was in the Low Countries – 'old, unhappye in a manner in exile, plundered not only of his fortune, but of all his musicall papers, nay, almost of his witts and vertue', as he described himself in a letter to Constantijn Huygens. He was also in France at one stage, for William Sanderson in Graphice (1658) said: 'Laniere in Paris, by a cunning way of tempering his colours with Chimney Soote, the painting becomes duskish, and seems ancient; which done, he roules up and thereby it crackls, and so mistaken for an old Principall, it being well copied from a good hand'. In 1656 Lanier published a book of etchings from drawings by Parmigianino, Prove prime fatti a l'aqua forte da N: Lanier a l'età sua giovanile di sessanta otto Anni 1656. A similar set from drawings by Parmigianino and Giulio Romano is entitled Maschere delineato di Julio Romano ex Collne NLanier (n.d.). Several portraits (including sketches) of him are known, one by Anthony van Dyck in the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna (see illustration), painted at Antwerp (or perhaps Genoa the previous year) and said to have been the work that prompted Charles I to invite van Dyck to England (where he stayed with Lanier's brother-in-law Edward Norgate).

Although it is apparent that much of his output has not survived – indeed he implied as much in the letter cited above – Lanier was one of the most important English songwriters of his time, particularly as an innovator. Bring away this sacred tree (1613) is one of the earliest declamatory ayres, a type that Henry and William Lawes, John Wilson, Charles Coleman and Lanier himself developed between 1620 and 1660. The accompaniment is chordal, anticipating a true continuo style, although the bass is not figured. The effect is of a heroic kind of declamation, almost completely unmelodic though strongly tonal and in harmony with the sumptuous Baroque qualities of Inigo Jones's décor, and other features of the Jacobean masque. His long recitative Hero and Leander ('Nor com'st thou yet') was probably composed soon after his return from Italy (though all the sources are post-1660), and it was surely inspired by Italian laments such as those of Sigismondo d'India. The various moods of Hero's soliloquy – her agonies and near-delirium as she awaits Leander and her final grief at his death – are expressed with amazing force. The style is quite different from that of his declamatory ayres: Roger North found in it 'passion, hope, fear, and despair, as strong as words and sounds can beare, and saving some pieces of Mr H.

Nicholas Lanier: portrait by Anthony van Dyck, 1628 (Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna)

Purcell, wee have nothing of this kind in English at all recommendable'. The piece has been described as the first use of true recitative in English music. Another Italian form that Lanier may have imported was the strophically varied aria over a repeated bass: he set Carew's No more shall meads be decked with flowers in this way.

IAN SPINK

Lanier, Sidney (Clopton) (b Macon, GA, 3 Feb 1842; d Lynn, NC, 7 Sept 1881). American poet, writer, flautist and composer. Descended from a family of musicians associated with the English court of the late 16th and early 17th centuries, he became proficient on many instruments as a child, later proclaiming himself self-taught in most musical matters. He graduated from Oglethorpe University in 1860, served in the Confederate Army and then spent several years in business ventures, but ultimately resolved to devote his time and energy to literary and musical pursuits.

Lanier is best known for his sensitive poetry, much of which has been set to music, but he also produced significant books and scholarly essays on music, a translation of Wagner's Das Rheingold and a libretto for Dudley Buck's cantata The Centennial Meditation of Columbia (1876), and lectured on music and literature at Johns Hopkins University. As a flautist he was known particularly for his facile technique and skill in sight-reading; his appointment to the Peabody Orchestra in Baltimore, as well as brief visits to New York, introduced him to the repertory and the progressive musical thought of the late 19th century. His compositions are generated more by idiomatic instrumental qualities than by a mature grasp of musical composition.

Lanier became an ardent admirer of Richard Wagner and expounded views similar to Wagner's on art, science and religion. Much of his work dealt with a systematic study of connections between poetry and music: he developed a technique of describing poetic metre through musical notation, and compared the phonetic structure of poetry with the timbre of music. His views generated considerable debate between those extolling his systematic approach to a complex problem and those criticizing his efforts as ill-founded and essentially naive.

Lankveld, Joris van. See MACROPEDIUS, GEORGIUS.

Lanner, Joseph (Franz Karl) (b St Ulrich, Vienna, 11 April 1801; d Oberdöbling, nr Vienna, 14 April 1843). Austrian composer and violinist. The son of a glover, Martin Lanner (1771–1839), and a housekeeper, Maria Scherhauff (1772–1823), Joseph Lanner was largely self-taught as a violinist and composer. In the late autumn of 1816 he and the Drahanek brothers, Anton (1797–1863) and Johann (1800–76), formed a trio, sometimes expanded to a sextet, to play music in the yards and small taverns of Vienna. In the spring of 1823 Johann Strauss (i) joined the ensemble as a viola player. Lanner divided his orchestra into two on 1 September 1825, with Strauss becoming conductor of the other half, and in the spring of 1827 Strauss left Lanner and founded his own orchestra. On 28 November 1828 Lanner married Franziska Jahn (1800–55), but marital difficulties led to their separation in 1838, and Lanner moved to a house in Oberdöbling with his mistress Maria Kraus. Early in 1829 Lanner became music director of the Redoutensäle in Vienna, and he also introduced promenade concerts into the Vienna Volksgarten in 1831. In 1833 he was appointed Kapellmeister of the Second Viennese militia regiment.

Lanner went on several concert tours to Pest (now Budapest) (1834 and 1835) and Graz (1837 and 1838), to Brno and Pressburg (now Bratislava), and on the occasion of the coronation festivities for Crown Prince Ferdinand in 1838 he undertook a long journey to Milan (by way of Linz, Innsbruck and Venice). His ensemble played in all the major dance cafés of Vienna, particularly the Sperl, the Dommayer, Zögernitz Casino and the Goldene Birn, and at many court festivities in the Redoutensäle. On 16 January 1840 he was conductor at the chamber ball in the Hofburg for the first time. He was known and highly regarded all over Europe, and his compositions were even played in America. At the height of his career he was managing several ensembles during the carnival season, employing some 200 musicians. Lanner gave his last concert on 21 March 1843, and died three weeks later of a typhoid infection at the age of 42.

Of his surviving children, Katharina Lanner (b Vienna, 14 Sept 1829; d London, 15 Nov 1908) became a famous ballerina, making her début at the Kärntnerthortheater on 17 July 1845; at the peak of her career she was known as 'the Taglioni of the North'. On retiring from the stage she founded a successful children's ballet in London. Lanner's son August (b Vienna, 23 Jan 1835; d Vienna, 27 Sept 1855) appeared as a violinist and conductor of his father's orchestra at the age of eight. He made his début with a newly founded orchestra on 19 March 1853 and within a short time became one of the leading light musicians of Vienna, but then died at the age of 20. The 33 compositions printed and published by Spina in Venice, show that he was a talented composer, and his D'ersten Gedanken op.1 and Amalien-Polka op.14 are still sometimes played.

With Johann Stauss (i), Lanner was the most important dance composer of the Biedermeier period, and the two musicians have rightly been called the fathers of the Viennese waltz. Even Lanner's early work shows further development of the waltz form introduced some years earlier by Joseph Wilde and Michael Pamer. Broad, sweeping melodies, rich harmonies and daring rhythmic subtleties are typical of his compositions. Above all the frequent use of minor keys gives Lanner's works a touch of melancholy, although the composer himself was cheerful and outgoing. After 1833 Lanner took over the classic waltz form developed by Strauss in 1830, with its introduction, five double waltzes and coda, and developed it further. In particular, he often set the introduction in several parts, sometimes achieving a symphonic effect by frequent changes of key and tempo. The coda also acquired larger dimensions, bringing the preceding waltzes together and thereby giving unity to the composition as a whole.

Lanner was an excellent violinist, and sometimes played technically demanding violin concertos, such as that of de Bériot, in the intervals of his concerts. He was also an outstanding orchestrator, combining the classical instruments of the orchestra with many mechanical sound effects and the human voice (his orchestral musicians were quite often called on to sing), especially in his many popular potpourris. Despite a lengthy period of some neglect, there has been an increasing awareness of Lanner's music. Small ensembles in particular have taken a greater interest in his work and tried to reproduce the original sound, and many new recordings have been made.

MOSCO CARNER/HERBERT KRENN

Lannis, Johannes de. See HILLANIS, JOHANNES.

Lannoy [Lanoy, Lanoys, Lannoys], Colinet [Colin] de (d before 6 Feb 1497). French composer. On 6 February 1477 he was granted a safe-conduct to leave Milan along with several other musicians (including Martini, Jappart and Compère) following the assassination of Duke Galeazzo Maria Sforza the previous year. He may have been related to two singers active at the French royal court, Jehan (1447–68) and David (1461–75) de Lannoy. Guillaume Crétin's Déploration sur le trépas de Jean Okeghem indicates that 'lannoys' (presumably the composer) predeceased his famous contemporary. This last detail appears to rule out identification with one 'Karolus de Launoy', a choirboy at Bourges in 1472 who spent his early manhood in France, emigrated to Italy, eventually settled in Florence, married the sister of Henricus Isaac's wife, and died in 1506.

Colinet's song Cela sans plus (3vv; ed. Brown, no.98) was described by Gombosi (76–7) as 'decidedly the weakest piece I have ever seen . . . a shabby, anaemic composition of minimal originality'; nevertheless it achieved considerable success, being adapted, expanded and used as the basis for masses by Martini and Obrecht. Possibly dating from the 1470s, it is ascribed to 'Collinet de lanoy' in I-Fn Banco Rari 229 and three other sources; a conflicting ascription to Josquin in I-Fn Magl.XIX.178 probably confuses the piece with an identically named song by that composer. Colinet's only other surviving song, the perhaps slightly later Adieu natuerlic leven mijn (4vv; ed. Lenaerts, 21), is one of several settings of the tune (by Edelinck and others).

A fragmentary mass cycle (3vv; Credo, Sanctus, Agnus Dei only) is given to 'lanoy' in CZ-HK II A 7. This source's ascriptions are of dubious reliability, and the 'lanoy' of the mass may refer to a different composer: possibly to one of the singers at the French royal chapel, or even to Karolus of Bourges (fragments of the Sanctus and Agnus Dei are transmitted anonymously in I-Rvat SP B80). While a possible pairing of the mass (which may date from the 1470s) with Ockeghem's Quinti toni cycle does suggest a possible central French origin, there are also stylistic affinities with the work of Martini (Colinet's colleague at the court of Milan) and with the two ascribed songs: all three works share uncomplicated, melodically driven textures, long drawn-out triadic points of imitation and a strong sense of harmonic polarity. These features, combined with a certain rigidity in the handling of the lowest voice, result in a slow rate of harmonic change, and a lack of sustained contrapuntal interest over extended passages. The overall impression is of a competent composer, if not of a consistently inspired one.

FABRICE FITCH

Lansbury, Angela (Brigid) (b London, 16 Oct 1925). English actress and singer. Her grandfather was George Lansbury, leader of Britain's Labour Party, and her mother was the actress Moyna McGill. She began her dramatic and musical training at London's Webber-Douglas School. During World War II the widowed McGill moved her family to New York, where Lansbury completed her studies at the Feagin School. She then moved to Hollywood, and was signed as a contract player at MGM. Her first film, Gaslight (1944), earned her an Academy Award nomination for Best Supporting Actress. For the next 20 years she played character roles in films and on television, usually portraying older, bitter women, most notably in The Manchurian Candidate (1962). After playing straight dramatic roles on Broadway beginning in 1957, she appeared in the critically panned musical Anyone Can Whistle (1964) by Sondheim. The title role in Herman's Mame (1966) proved far more successful; the character's eccentricity and generosity of spirit were echoed in a second Herman musical, Dear World (1969), based on Giradoux's Madwoman of Chaillot, and both portrayals received Tony Awards. In 1970 she starred in Walt Disney's musical film Bedknobs and Broomsticks. Subsequently she appeared as Rose in acclaimed revivals of Gypsy in London (1973) and New York (1974), and created the part of Mrs. Lovett in Sondheim's quasi-opera Sweeney Todd (1979). From 1984 to 1996 her energies were devoted to the CBS-TV mystery series Murder, She Wrote. Her only musical roles during this period were portrayals of a teapot in Disney's animated film Beauty and the Beast (1991), and Mrs. Santa Claus for ABC-TV in 1996.

Lansbury's dramatic talents enabled her to create a vulnerable, pathetic Rose in Gypsy; her unique portrayal forestalled any immediate comparison with Ethel Merman's greater vocal prowess in the original production. Nevertheless, Lansbury was able to cope with the exacting demands of Sondheim's complicated melodies and rhythms in Sweeney Todd, although the gruesome exigencies of the plot called for her to hawk more than sing. She navigated her contralto range with intelligence, belting the exuberant score of Mame, while lightening the voice in the gentler moments of Dear World. See M.W. Bonanno: Angela Lansbury: a Biography (New York, 1987).

HOWARD GOLDSTEIN

Länsiö, Tapani (b Helsinki, 22 Oct 1953). Finnish composer and choral conductor. He studied composition with Kokkonen and Heininen at the Sibelius Academy, where he took his diploma in music theory in 1988 and where he began teaching in 1979, from 1993 as a lecturer. Since 1984 he has been artistic director of Polyteknikkojen kuoro, the male voice choir of the Helsinki University of Technology. From 1987 to 1999 he was music critic of the newspaper Helsingin sanomat and from 1998 to 1999 composer-in-residence of the Jyväskylä SO. He regularly contributes to the music programmes of the FBC.

Länsiö is a composer of small-scale works characterized by minute control of detail. His favourite instrument is the human voice and his vocal writing, both for solo voice and a cappella chorus, arises from the idea that meaning and sound are one. There is an innate lyricism and a considerable wit in his songs, for example in 17 laulua kesästä [17 Songs of Summer] (1992). The String Quartet of 1995 with its rhythmic energy uncovers another side of his musical personality.

ILKKA ORAMO

Lansky, Paul (b New York, 18 June 1944). American composer and theorist. He studied with Perle and Weisgall at Queens College, CUNY (BA 1966), and with Milton Babbitt, Edward Cone and Earl Kim at Princeton University (MFA 1969, PhD 1973). His teaching appointments include positions at Mannes College (1963–8), Swarthmore College (1968–9) and Princeton University (1969–). He has received awards from the League of Composers-ISCM (1975), the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters (1977), and the Koussevitzky (1981), Fromm (1986) and Guggenheim (1990) foundations, among others.

While studying at Princeton, Lansky began to experiment with divergent approaches to 12-note composition. His attraction to serialism through Babbitt's teachings inspired him to learn computer synthesis, which he used to probe more deeply into the properties of the 12-note technique. He also began to look carefully at Perle's description of the so-called 'twelve-tone modal system'. His insights led to an intense collaboration with Perle from 1969 to 1973 and contributed to Perle's later formulations of 'twelve-tone tonality'. Lansky's artistic development ultimately led him away from experimentation with abstract pitch-class relations. Since the early 1970s, he has used the computer as a kind of 'aural camera' on the sounds of the world, chiselling out the implicit musical qualities of 'realworld' sounds. Six Fantasies on a Poem by Thomas Campion (1978–9), a set of computer explorations on the sounds of speech and poetry, was his first significant work in this genre. In the mid-1980s some of his computer compositions began to employ a tonal-like syntax. In these works, however, tonal relationships serve as a foundation for sonic exploration, rather than as an assertion of tonality as a structural principle.

Lansky's broad musical interests are exemplified by his use of blues, folk and ethnic music in Folk Images (1980–81), Guy's Harp (1984) and Not So Heavy Metal (1989). He experiments with 'realworld noises' such as kitchen implements, highways and shopping malls in Table's Clear (1990), Night Traffic (1990) and Quakerbridge (1990). A continuing preoccupation with the sound and content of speech is evident in Idle Chatter (1985), Smalltalk (1988), Now and Then (1991) and Memory Pages (1993). He is also the author of Cmix, a Unix-based music tool kit for the computer.

ELLIOTT ANTOKOLETZ

Lantins, de. Several Franco-Flemish composers and musicians of the early 15th century bearing this name may well have been related. All are thought to have come from the diocese of Liège.

(1) Berthold [Bernold] de Lantins alias de Bolsée (d 24 Jan 1413). Cleric and singer. He was canon at St Jean l'Evangeliste in Liège in 1372 and apparently a singer there from 1379 until his death (see Auda).

(2) Ray. de Lan(tins) (fl before 1445). Composer. He wrote the Ut queant laxis (two voices with fauxbourdon) in D-Mbs Mus.Ms.3224. The manuscript otherwise contains works of Dunstaple, Du Fay, Christopherus de Feltro and Bartolomeus Brollo, as well as an incomplete copy of the Mass Verbum incarnatum by (4) Arnold de Lantins. He is possibly to be identified with the Reynaldus Tenorista at Treviso Cathedral from 2 February 1438 to 25 December 1439.

(3) Johannes de Lotinis [Lothin] (*fl c*1475–1480). Singer. He came from Dinant and is listed in 1480 among the singers at the royal court of Naples, where he was a colleague of Tinctoris. He was the dedicatee of Tinctoris's Expositio manus (CoussemakerS, iv, 1; *c*1475), where he is described as a 'young man'. In De inventione et usu musicae (*c*1480–87), Tinctoris again mentioned Johannes, in this case in a listing of several of the finest singers of the day, where he is described as a soprano (see Weinmann).

(4) Arnold [Arnoldo, Arnoldus] de Lantins [Lantinis, Latinis] (d Rome, before 2 July 1432). Composer. He is listed, together with (5) Hugo de Lantins, as a member of the chapel of Malatesta di Malatestis of Pesaro on 8 June 1423, and both are linked to Du Fay at about the same time by references in Du Fay's song Hé compagnons (see Planchart). Annotations to two of Arnold's songs in GB-Ob 213 (Se ne prenés and Quant je mire) indicate that he was in Venice in March 1428. From November 1431 to June 1432 he was a singer in the chapel of Pope Eugenius IV, together with Du Fay and Malbecque. He death in June or July of 1432 is documented by Malbecque's request for Arnold's benefice at the parish church of Fermes in the diocese of Liège (see Planchart); this negates the contention that his ballade Puisque je sui cyprianés was written in connection with the arrival of Anne de Lusignan on the mainland in 1434. Arnold's works appear primarily in northern Italian manuscripts from the 1420s and 1430s.

The esteem in which Arnold was held around 1430 can be assessed from the extremely wide distribution of his Marian motet Tota pulchra es as also from the equal status with Du Fay, Binchois and Ciconia afforded him in the tenor partbook to GB-Ob 213 in F-Pn n.a.fr.4379 (see Schoop). Further indication of his reputation is the pride of place his work is given at the beginning of I-Bc Q15. This source begins with a composite Marian mass by Arnold and Ciconia: Arnold's introit, Kyrie, Sanctus and Agnus are grouped with a Gloria with the Marian trope 'Spiritus et alme' and a Credo, both by Ciconia.

Most of Arnold's mass music survives in the earliest layer of I-Bc Q15, suggesting a date in the middle or early 1420s. In his four movements of the composite mass there is a liturgical unity imposed by use of appropriate chants in the tenors of each successive movement (the introit 'Salve sancta parens', LU 1263, and the Kyrie, Sanctus and Agnus of Vatican Mass IX, LU 40); this is reinforced by the use of the trope 'Marie filius' in the tenor of the Sanctus. These movements are probably the earliest compositions among the mass music, possibly dating from before Arnold moved to Italy. There are several variants in the Sanctus melody that point to northern French origins (see P.J. Thannabauer, Das einstimmige Sanctus, Munich, 1962). Each of Arnold's Gloria-Credo pairs is united musically by various means – head-motifs, tail-motifs, tonality and mensuration (see Hamm and Widaman) – and the third pair, cited below, is further unified by the use of identical music in the opening sections and at mensuration changes.

The Mass Verbum incarnatum, so named because of the Kyrie trope, appears in the second layer of I-Bc Q15, I-Bu 2216 and GB-Ob 213, and may be somewhat later.

All five movements are closely linked by head-motifs and tonality, but a more subtle underlying connection is their shared musical references to the composer's Marian motet O pulcherrima mulierum. These references and the Kyrie and Sanctus tropes suggest that this may have been a votive Mass for Advent (see Strohm, 1990).

Arnold's two Marian motets feature florid melodic writing in the upper voice and relatively simple supporting voices. Tota pulchra es was probably written originally as a three-voice work, but a fourth voice, possibly by Arnold himself, appears in I-Bc Q15 (see Nosow, 1992). The lauda setting In tua memoria is much simpler in style, proceeding in a series of rhythmically simple phrases with largely syllabic texting.

The songs are also written for three voices, with a focus on florid melodic writing above tenor and contratenor. Arnold occasionally used imitation (Ce jour de l'an), but never to the extent seen in contemporary works by Hugo de Lantins. Las pouray je mon martir begins with expressive fermatas above the first few words. Most of the songs set rather conventional courtly love poems in formes fixes, although there are few tantalizing references to specific circumstances: Sans de plaisir refers to May Day, and Puisque je suis cyprianés clearly refers to a specific woman.

(5) Hugo [Hugho, Ugho, Ugo] de Lantins [Lantinis, Latinis] (fl 1420–30). Composer. His works appear in the same manuscripts as those of (4) Arnold de Lantins. The precise familial relationship between Arnold and Hugo de Lantins remains unclear, although it is likely that they were of the same generation. Like Arnold, Hugo was a member of the Malatesta chapel in 1423, and was an acquaintance of Du Fay at this time (see (4) above). There are also several musical connections between Hugo's works and those of Du Fay (see Allsen, 1992 and Fallows). Other direct documentation of Hugo's activities is lacking, but his surviving works provide evidence of his activities in Italy. His Tra quante regione praises Sparta, the Eastern Roman Empire and Cleofe Malatesta. Both this work and Du Fay's isorhythmic motet Vasilissa ergo gaude seem to have been composed for Cleofe's embarkation for Greece in 1420 to wed Theodore Palaiologos. Mirar non posso refers to the Colonna family of Rome, who were linked by marriage to the Malatestas in the wedding celebrated by Du Fay's Resvelliés vous. The motet Celsa sublimatur/Sabine presul refers specifically to the city of Bari, and probably dates from 1424 or 1425, when Antonio Colonna was briefly viceroy of Apulia. Hugo's Christus vincit celebrates the Venetian Doge Francesco Foscari (1423–57) by setting the laudes regiae sung twice yearly in the Doge's honour. O lux et decus Hispanie reworks the music of Christus vincit, and may have been written around 1430 for Bishop Pietro Emiliani of Vicenza.

The openings of the paired Gloria and Credo are identical in all three voices; both repeat their tenor pattern several times (three in the Gloria and four in the Credo), and both reflect material from the tenor in the other parts (see Gossett). Imitation plays a role in two of Hugo's Glorias. In the Gloria P 17 (with tempus perfectum diminutum and low tessitura in all voices), two of the voices are set in canon throughout. In the Gloria P 15, virtually every successive line of text is set off by a brief point of imitation between cantus and tenor.

Hugo's motets represent a cross-section of all motet styles current in the 1420s. Celsa sublimatur/Sabine presul, which may have served as a model for Du Fay's St Nicholas motet O gemma, lux et speculum, is fully isorhythmic, with two taleae in all voices. Ave gemma claritatis is a response to the Italianate 'equal discantus' style of the early 15th century, with its long opening echo imitation and two contrapuntally equal upper voices (see Nosow, 1991). Ave verum corpus, also for four voices, has an extremely florid upper line set above three rhythmically simple lower voices. In Christus vincit and its contrafactum O lux et decus Hispanie, as in the Gloria P 17, Hugo sets off individual lines of text with brief imitations.

Imitation also plays a role in virtually all of Hugo's songs, affording them a more solemn and learned sound than that of Arnold's more lyrical secular music. While most of Hugo's songs use the imitative procedure noted above (for example A ma dame, where each of the rondeau refrain's four lines is marked with imitations between cantus and tenor), he also experimented with various musical effects. In Tra quante regione, he makes striking use of rhythmic sequences similar to those heard in contemporary isorhythmic motets and earlier Italian songs by Ciconia. Plaindre m'estuet poses difficult problems of musica ficta, while Je suy extent features intricate changes of mensuration. The majority of the songs are rondeaux, but Hugo also produced four Italian songs. Like the closely contemporary Italian songs of Du Fay, these works adapt some musical features common to Ciconia and the earlier generation of Italian composers, while taking liberties with established Italian poetic forms (see Pirrotta and StrohmR).

Lanyuk, Yury (b L'viv, 1957). Ukrainian composer. He graduated from L'viv Conservatory as a cellist and composer (Dezidery Zador's class) and, after studying privately with Nikodemowicz, he undertook postgraduate work with Chervov at the Kiev Conservatory before returning to teach in L'viv at the Lysenko Music Institute. He won the Revutsky Composition Prize in 1989. His style is influenced by late-Romantic Austro-German traditions, the constructional principles of the Second Viennese School as well as the lyrical heritage of Ukrainian song and romance. His reliance on the speech intonations of the poetry of various nations and his own performing experience have both conditioned the significance of the linear principle in his musical language. These tendencies are also related to his inclination to combine polyphonic complexity with colourful orchestral effects.

On returning to Naples in 1812 he was appointed singing teacher at the Real Collegio di Musica (now the Conservatorio di Musica S Pietro a Majella) and at the Pensionato Reale dei Miracoli.

(3) Francesco Lanza (b Naples, 1783; d Naples, 1862). Pianist and composer, son of (1) Giuseppe Lanza. At the age of nine he moved with his father to London, where he studied the piano in the circle of Muzio Clementi. In 1804, during a brief return visit to Naples, he gave one of the first public piano concerts known to have taken place in the city. Back in London he continued a career as a pianist and composer, publishing various compositions, and providing the music for the ballet The Caliph of Bagdad (1809), by the choreographer Auguste-Armand Vestris.

He returned to Naples, where he taught both privately and in girls' boarding-schools, and appeared in the city's leading salons, quickly becoming the leading pianist in Naples. In 1830 he became a piano teacher in the local conservatory, a post which he had first been offered in 1827. Here, for more than 30 years he educated generations of musicians, including Michelangelo Russo, Giuseppe Lillo, Constantino Palumbo, Michele Ruta and Ciro Pinsuti, thus becoming the founder of the Neapolitan piano school.

His compositions – exclusively for piano and including two concertos, fantasias on operatic themes, salon music, two sonatas and a piano method – reveal a solid harmonic manner and an elegant vein of melody, as well as the legacy of Clementi's classicism, through which influences of the Romantic and harpsichord repertories are sometimes re-elaborated.

Another son of (1) Giuseppe, a singer whose name is unknown, was born in London and finished his studies there. At the age of about 20 he moved to Paris, where he lived for some years. In 1838 he taught singing in Lille, and in 1841 he settled in the USA. Details of a son 'Giuseppe', who was said to have worked in London and Naples, are now thought to be an amalgamation in some sources of the activities of (1) Giuseppe and (3) Francesco.

Lanza, Alcides (b Rosario, 2 June 1929). Argentine composer, conductor, pianist and teacher. His early studies were in Buenos Aires with Ruwin Erlich (piano), Julian Bautista (composition) and Roberto Kinsky (conducting). Thereafter he attended courses given by Loriod, Messiaen, Maderna and Ginastera at the Di Tella Institute, where he worked intensively in electronic composition. He also studied electronic engineering at the Escuela Industrial de la Nación, Rosario. From 1959 to 1965 he was rehearsal pianist at the Teatro Colón, and then a Guggenheim Fellowship enabled him to study with Ussachevsky at the Columbia-Princeton Electronic Music Center (1966–70); at that time he also lectured on music appreciation at the New York City Community College. In 1971 he was appointed associate professor of composition and electronic music at McGill University, and he received a Deutscher Akademischer Austauschdienst grant to live in Berlin from 1972 to 1973. While in Europe he toured as associate music director of the Composer/Performers Group; he also directed the Composers' Group for International Performance and was a member of the Asociación Música Viva of Buenos Aires, which, from 1960, has given first performances of avant-garde compositions in Argentina and elsewhere in Latin America. In addition he has, since his youth, travelled extensively in the Americas as a pianist, lecturer, composer and conductor. His major preoccupation has been electronic music. Eidesis II, first performed at Tanglewood in 1967, has, in Lanza's words, 'masses of sound in motion, with an enormous charge of sensuality, resolved in several "orgasms of sound"'. The piece employs quarter-tone tuning, special coloured lights and contact microphones for the strings.

In 1971 he was appointed professor of composition at McGill University, Montreal, and since 1974 he has been director of the Electronic Music Studio at McGill. He received the CIDEM (Consejo Interamericano de Música) 1996 award for his contribution to the promotion of contemporary music. Alone ... together ...? was his second five-hour piano marathon with music from the Americas written for keyboard and electronics, held at the Pollard Concert Hall, in April 1992. In addition he has written several essays about electronic and contemporary music.

Lanza, Mario [Cocozza, Alfred Arnold] (b Philadelphia, 31 Jan 1921; d Rome, Italy, 7 Oct 1959). American tenor. He first studied singing while working as a piano mover in Philadelphia and in 1942 was awarded a summer scholarship at the Berkshire Music Center. Shortly afterwards he entered the Special Services of the armed forces and sang regularly for military radio shows during World War II. After his discharge he made a series of concert appearances, including a performance at the Hollywood Bowl in 1946. His first film role in That Midnight Kiss (1949) brought him immediate national recognition and fame. He subsequently made six further films, including The Great Caruso (1951) and The Toast of New Orleans (1950), in which he sang his greatest hit, Be my love (Brodszky and Cahn). Although he possessed a voice of great power and range, Lanza sang in only one opera, Puccini's Madama Butterfly, with the New Orleans Opera (1948). He was idolized as a romantic figure with a marvellous voice who chose films over opera. In the early 1950s he presented his own radio show. At this time his problems with obesity became increasingly severe, and they may have contributed to his early death at the age of 38.

JEAN W. THOMAS

Lanzetti, Domenico. Italian cellist and composer, possibly related to SALVATORE LANZETTI.

Lanzetti, Salvatore (b Naples, *c*1710; d Turin, *c*1780). Italian cellist and composer. He studied at the Naples Conservatorio di S Maria di Loreto. For a short time he was a member of the court chapel in Lucca and in 1727 entered the service of Vittorio Amedeo II in Turin, a post he retained despite numerous tours in northern Europe. By the second half of the 1730s he was in Paris and then London, where he seems to have lived until at least 1754. He had great success there and, according to Burney, helped to establish a taste for the cello. In May 1751 he gave concerts in Frankfurt. He returned to Italy about 1760 and rejoined the royal chapel in Turin, of which he probably remained a member until his death.

Lanzetti was one of the most innovative cellists of his era, advancing many aspects of cello technique. His own virtuosity is evident in his solo compositions through the intricacy of bowings, dynamic contrasts and note range. The tessitura of the cello was extended to b″ in his Sonatas op.1, while his proficiency with slurred staccato bowings was testified to by Corrette, who credited him with bringing such techniques to cello performance. The notated fingerings of his exercises are of particular interest and show consistency with the fingering patterns demonstrated by Corrette. Lanzetti used diatonic fingerings for half, first and second positions, but compressed third and fourth positions as a means of circumscribing the neck joint. His use of thumb position was fluent, with inclusion of the fourth finger a salient feature.

The cellist and composer Domenico Lanzetti was perhaps related to Salvatore. Two of his cello sonatas and five concertos are extant (D-Bsb). Six concertos, mentioned by Eitner, were formerly in the same library.

Laos [Lao People's Democratic Republic] (Saathiaranarath Prachhathipatay Prachhachhon Lao). The Lao People's Democratic Republic is a small, landlocked country in mainland South-east Asia bordering Vietnam, China, Myanmar (Burma), Thailand and Cambodia. Before its partition into the princedoms of Luang Prabang, Vientiane (also spelt Viang Chan) and Champassak soon after 1700, the 14th-century kingdom of Lan Sang ('Million Elephants') was a significant power in the region. After 1827, when Siamese armies defeated the Lao and sacked Vientiane, most Lao-occupied territory west of the Mekong river was absorbed into Siam (present-day Thailand). Although much of the current population of north-east Thailand is culturally Lao, their music has developed on a different path, one influenced by Bangkok's modernization and the development of urban popular culture. About half of the 5·3 million population is comprised of upland, non-Lao-speaking groups, many of whom practise swidden agriculture on the mountainsides. The ethnic Lao population is concentrated in lowland valleys, especially along the Mekong and its tributaries, and on the Vientiane plain north of the capital. Laos was a kingdom until 1975, when the communist Pathet Lao overthrew the royalists, resulting in economic collapse and mass emigration, the latter including many of the country's musicians, singers and dancers.

Although not exclusive, the following four musical categories are useful: traditional village vocal genres with instrumental accompaniment; classical music surviving from the former court; popular songs; and musics of non-Lao upland groups. Because Laos consists of isolated villages and towns with little infrastructure (roads, transportation or communications), village genres show great variation. The court tradition exists primarily in Vientiane, the capital, with pockets of activity in Luang Prabang and Champassak. Popular songs are characteristic of the cities along the Mekong, where influence from Thailand is strongest. Least studied are the musics of the many upland groups, scattered throughout the country. Culturally, they are related to upland minorities in neighbouring Vietnam and China. Research on Lao musics, modest before 1975, ceased at that time until the early 1990s, when foreign scholars were allowed to return, albeit in small numbers.

1. Village vocal genres. Lao vocal genres predominantly consist of male-female repartee in a ritualized derivative of courtship. This is analogous to the spoken phanya, a lovers' dialogue consisting of memorized units of poetry and proverbs, which is mostly expressed in simile, metaphor and double entendre. The musical analogue is embodied in two terms, lam (used in southern Laos) and khap (central and northern Laos). The textual subjects include feigned courtship, with or without insults and sexual innuendo, discussions and challenges concerning matters of history, Buddhism, geography and other subjects, didactic poems on correct behaviour and topical comments. Whereas phanya was functional, lam and khap are repartee performances featuring vocal melody and instrumental accompaniment.

Five northern genre names are preceded with khap: khap ngeum from the Ngum river valley north-east of Vientiane; khap thoum from the former royal capital, Luang Prabang; khap phouan for the Lao Phouan, a sub-group living in the Xieng Khouang area; khap sam neua after Sam Neua village in Houaphan province; and khap thai dam after the Thai Dam ('Black Thai') sub-group of central Laos. Each of these genres exists in isolation, with little that unifies them stylistically.

Eight southern genre names are preceded with lam: lam sithandone (also called lam siphandone) and lam som from southern Champassak province; lam saravane from Saravane province; lam ban xok from Xok village near Savannakhet city; lam tang vay from Tang Vay village (located 95 kilometres south-east of Savannakhet); lam khon savan from Savannakhet province; lam mahaxay from Mahaxay (located 40 kilometres east of Thakhek city in Khammouane province); and lam phou thai after the Phou Thai sub-group living in southern Laos. In addition, many southern Lao singers perform genres from north-east Thailand, especially the repartee form lam klawn (also called lam tat) and the theatrically derived lam pleun.

Each genre is mainly distinguished by its dialect, scale form, melodic shape, accompaniment pattern and performance practices, but also to some extent by its accompanying instruments. Many are easily recognisable to outsiders, but distinguishing some genres in the south requires great attention to detail. Since the differences in dialect are least among the lam genres, southern singers can routinely perform two or more genres. These genres are also closest in style to those of north-east Thailand just across the Mekong river. Indeed, certain lam genres have given rise to localized genres in Thailand, especially lam phanya yoi and toei hua non tan in the Mukdahan area.

A vast repertory of poetry must be memorized by each singer. Literacy in Laos, especially in remote rural areas, is far from universal, making oral transmission a necessity. In north-east Thailand teachers often write out texts. Most poetry is constructed in kon form, i.e. stanzas having four lines, each with seven basic beats or syllables, but singers may add prefixes, suffixes and extra syllables to the basic seven. This arrangement produces duple metre. In addition, each stanza requires a pattern of lexical tone marks, but because the language has three consonant classes, each with its own realization of tone marks, this arrangement pattern allows varying melodic interpretations.

The relationships between lexical tones and musical tones are complex, as the resultant performance requires coordination among several elements, including scale, a typical melodic shape for each regional genre, and overall (but not rigid) correspondence of individual lexical tones and melodic contour; these are tempered by elements of personal style. Non-conformity of melodic phrase and lexical tone resulting from a genre's typical melodic shape, potentially altering a word's meaning, can be avoided by the singer's addition of slides to or from main notes. This kind of flexible melodic line, which maintains its genre-specific identity while avoiding regularity and predictability, is what is meant by lam, and what distinguishes traditional singing from hong, the term for singing songs with fixed melodies such as popular, patriotic and foreign songs.

Traditional village music performances occur in conjunction with calendrical, Buddhist and national festivals. These include boun song kan (water throwing festival, April), boun bang fai (rocket festival, May), boun kathin (giving gifts to Buddhist monks, October–November), boun phavet (chanting the story of Prince Vetsandone's life, February–March), ordinations, temple fairs, the Western New Year and certain national holidays. Three additional Lao rituals provide contexts for other forms of chanting and singing: the boun bang fai rocket festival, which features responsorial singing called seung bang fai; lam phi fa rituals to cure people made ill by spirits, and Buddhist ceremonies requiring Pāli-language chant (sout) and Lao-language sermons (thet).

1. Khene (free-reed mouth organ with 16 pipes) player near Muang Roi Et, Thailand, 1973

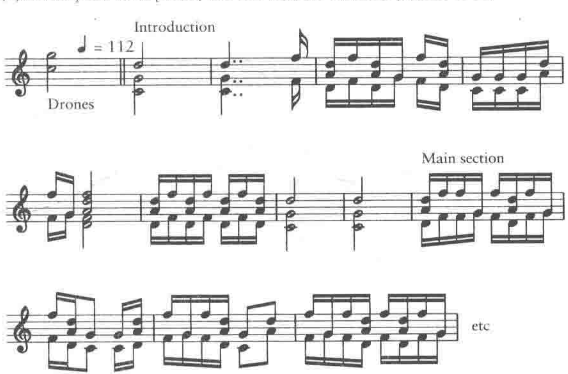
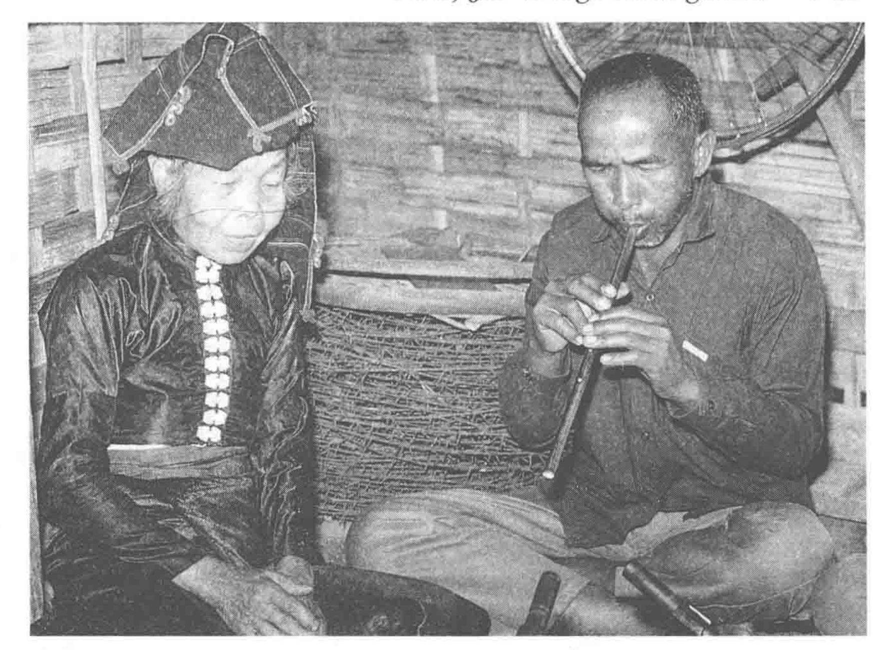
All but two village genres (khap thai dam and khap thoum) require the accompaniment of Laos's most distinctive musical instrument, the khene (see KHA), a free-reed bamboo mouth organ in raft form, either alone or in combination with other village instruments. The typical Lao khene has 14 pipes in two rows of seven pipes each, but instruments with 6, 10, 16 and 18 pipes also exist (fig.1). Instruments with 16 pipes from north-east Thailand have come to dominate in southern Laos. Khene slightly less than one metre in length are usual, although instruments up to three or four metres were formerly used. Except for the Phouan khene, all 14- and 16-tube instruments have the same relative tuning. Expressed in a pitch-letter system that distinguishes the near-tempered semitones from the whole tones while avoiding sharps and flats, the two-octave tuning system runs diatonically from a to a″. Right-hand pitches (from front to back) are a–c′–g′–a′–b′–d″–e″–a″; left-handed pitches are c″–b–d′–e′–f′–g′–f″–g″. Instruments with 14 tubes omit the highest pair (a′ and g′). This arrangement, while appearing illogical, facilitates playing in five pentatonic modes while maintaining balance between the hands and avoiding more than three consecutive pipes in any mode. Players, all of whom are male, cause the silver-copper alloy free reeds to vibrate, each producing a single note, when they cover a pipe's finger-hole while inhaling or exhaling through the carved wooden windchest. Multiple pitches are produced by covering more than one finger-hole; pieces of the black khisout insect wax that seals the bamboo pipes into the windchest are used to cover one or two finger-holes, producing drones. Typically tilting the instrument slightly to the left, the player can create solos or play accompaniments within a simple modal system.

Whereas Thai khene players tend to have a comprehensive view of the instrument and its repertory, few Lao players do, mostly playing the patterns of the vocal genres they accompany. In the north-east Thai modal system, lai, there are two pentatonic scale forms, which can be called san and nyao. The san scale can be expressed as G–A–C–D–E and nyao as A–C–D–E–G. In each case the lowest note serves as a tonic. The various modes (ex.1*a*) (lai) provide a variety of starting pitches and moods for each scale. The san modes are lai sutsanaen (G–A–C–D–E), lai po sai (C–D–F–G–A) (ex.1*b*) and lai soi (D–E–G–A–B); the nyao modes are lai nyai (A–C–D–E–G), lai noi (D–F–G–A–C) and an unnamed mode on E (E–G–A–B–D).



Khene players in Laos commonly classify accompaniments and programmatic solos in reference to specific vocal genres, but some non-programmic solos are denoted by theoretical terms related to those of north-east Thailand



Ex.1

2. Female Thai Dam singer accompanied by a pi louang (free-reed pipe), Xieng Khouang province, 1991

3. Musicians in remote Saravane playing the khene (free-reed mouth organ), kachappi (lute) and so (fiddle)

(e.g. lai noi is called tit sut noi). Solo playing in Laos is slower, less prevalent and less virtuoso than that of Thailand, remaining closer to the original accompanimental patterns. An example of a khene piece may be found in KHAEN.

Other Lao village instruments are of less importance than the khene. The Thai Dam minority, who are related to the Lao, use a free-reed pipe with finger-holes, the larger called pi louang (fig.2) and the smaller called pi bap. The classical bamboo duct flute (khoui) can be used to ornament the accompanimental melody. Small, home-made plucked lutes called phin or kachappi, of various shapes and with two to four strings, are commonly used in conjunction with the khene. Locally made fiddles called so, derived from the classical so i, are sometimes played (fig.3).

Lao village musicians also use a small number of idiophones: one is melodic, while the rest have a rhythmic function. The former is a rarely seen vertical xylophone of tuned logs called dung lung in Laos and bong lang or kha law in north-east Thailand. More common are small metal cymbals borrowed from the classical tradition called sing and slightly larger cymbals called sap. The southern Lao ngop ngep consists of two hinged pieces of wood, about 30 cm long; a block of wood is used to scrape the teeth carved into the underside of the lower piece of wood. Various small barrel drums are simply called kong.

Of the southern lam vocal genres, all require at least the khene for accompaniment, although the kachappi, so, khoui, drum and other percussion instruments may also be added. Khap genres in the north, however, are normally accompanied only by the khene, with the exception of khap thoum from Luang Prabang, which requires a small, classical-style ensemble consisting of fiddles, dulcimer and flute, plus percussion. Khene playing for khap tends to be rhythmically free and sometimes monophonic (without drones), while lam patterns are metrical and fuller in sound because of the presence of drones and multiple notes.

A singer is called mo lam or mo khap and the accompanist mo khene (mo: 'skilled person'). Although audiences prefer younger, single female singers to older, married ones, older singers of both sexes continue to perform. While being a singer or musician does not admit one to élite society, singers are respected for their knowledge of culture, history, proper behaviour, stories, Buddhism and the art of courtship. Because many of the most famous singers fled Laos in 1975, and those who remain live in a poor country with little infrastructure, it has been difficult for singers to build lucrative careers or attain the star status possible in relatively prosperous and modern north-east Thailand. After 1975 the new communist government sent many of the remaining singers to 'seminars' (re-education camps) and created a hierarchy of national, provincial, and city cultural officials to manage public performance. In the late 1980s singers were no longer required to sing propaganda for the government, but neither could they criticize lazy or corrupt officials or make pointed comments on society as they had before 1975.

Distinguishing the 12 regional vocal genres requires attention to detail but is possible for outsiders. Each is briefly described below in terms of scale, metre, relationship to accompaniment and other pertinent features.

(i) Lam sithandone. Similar to traditional Ubon-style lam in north-east Thailand, lam sithandone is usually accompanied by solo khene playing metrically in a san mode. Each singer, however, opens with a non-metrical section that then becomes metred with the scale remaining somewhat ambiguous, wavering between san and nyao.

(ii) Lam som. Now extremely rare, lam som is actually hexatonic, using the pentatonic nyao scale plus a supertonic (B): A–B–C–D–E–G. The singer declaims the text in speech rhythm to slow but metrical accompaniment, emphasizing pitches A, B, and D at cadences. The nearest equivalent in north-east Thailand is lam pheun, an almost extinct narrative genre.

(iii) Lam saravane. Sung by Lao-speaking people of Mon-Khmer origin living in the remote Saravane area along the Se Done river, lam saravane is sung and played in the nyao scale. While the accompaniment, provided by a small ensemble dominated by khene, is metrical, the singer declaims phrases in rapid speech-rhythm that follows a descending contour.

(iv) Lam ban xok. Distinguishing lam ban xok from nearby lam khon savan is difficult, since both use khene, either alone or a small ensemble, both have metrical accompaniment in the san scale, and both have near-metrical vocal parts. The differences lie more in function, for lam ban xok is not for ordinary occasions but is associated with ceremonial occasions.

(v) Lam tang vay. Said to be a lowland Lao derivative of upland Mon-Khmer singing, lam tang vay is easily distinguished by its four-note descending accompaniment pattern (A–A–G–G–F–D) that is played by a small ensemble. Informants report that this genre was originally a type of khap accompanied by free-reed pipe or flute.

(vi) Lam khon savan. Considered the most important Lao village singing genre, lam khon savan is primarily performed by professionals. Using the san scale, its melodic patterns are easily confused with those of lam ban xok and lam mahaxay in Laos and toei hua non tan and lam phanya yoi in north-east Thailand. The vocal part tends to have a flexible short–long rhythmic lilt, while the accompaniment is in even pulses (ex.2).

Ex.2 Vocal and accompanimental melodies at opening of lam khon savan

(vii) Lam mahaxay. Distinguishing lam mahaxay from lam khon savan and lam ban xok requires attention to a long-held or melismatically ornamented high note that precedes the vocal line's descent to the tonic pitch.

(viii) Lam phou thai. The term Phou Thai, meaning 'Thai people', refers to upland Tai speakers from north-eastern Laos and nearby Vietnam who migrated to lowland Laos and became acculturated. Whereas the Phou Thai have their own style of singing, the genre called lam phou thai denotes a lowland Lao adaptation sung in the nyao scale with metrical ensemble accompaniment and a declamatory, descending vocal line.

(ix) Khap ngeum. Performed by people living near Vientiane along the Ngum river who probably came from north-eastern Laos, khap ngeum is accompanied by solo khene playing non-metrical, melismatic lines, especially after the singer has declaimed a line of poetry; both use the nyao scale. The slow pace of delivery allows singers to improvise poetry and thereby comment on current events.

(x) Khap phouan. Living in the cool uplands near the Plain of Jarres and Xieng Khouang, the Lao sub-group called Phouan perform khap accompanied by solo khene, but their instrument has 14 pipes in a configuration of pitches different from the standard form, including one silent (reedless) pipe. Males sing in metre accompanied by a repetitive khene pattern, while females usually answer in non-metrical, heightened speech. Both use pitches of the nyao scale.

(xi) Khap sam neua. The genre most remote from mainstream Lao styles, khap sam neua originated in an area that straddles Houaphan province in the north-east and nearby Vietnam. The singers are usually Nua, a Lao sub-group. Using the nyao scale and accompanied by a khene having 10 to 14 pipes, singers declaim the text within a narrow vocal range, ending each phrase with a cadence that alternates tonic with sub-tonic.

(xii) Khap thoum. The former royal capital, Luang Prabang, which had a classical music tradition until 1975, is the centre of khap thoum, a repartee genre that is accompanied by a small ensemble consisting of classical instruments (fiddles, flute, dulcimer and percussion). Each singer's section is answered by a chorus sung by onlookers. Based on a 1 2 3 5 6 scale form, with passing use of 4 (eg. C–D–E–G–A–, with F), both singing and accompaniment are metrical and based on a semi-fixed melody (exx.3*a* and 3*b*).

Ex.3 Typical melodic patterns for khap thoum

(b) Vocal line

To summarize, the khap genres are accompanied by solo khene (khap thoum excepted), and through their geographical isolation each has unique characteristics. Not surprisingly, northern singers usually know only one genre. The lam genres of southern Laos are more often accompanied by a small ensemble, with the khene as an essential instrument. Southern singers typically perform more than one genre, since their locales are less geographically isolated and somewhat similar in style. Furthermore, all lam genres have metrical accompaniments, but only three (tang vay, khon savan and mahaxay) have metrical vocal lines. Descending melodic contours dominate lam styles as well, with the exception of sithandone and som.

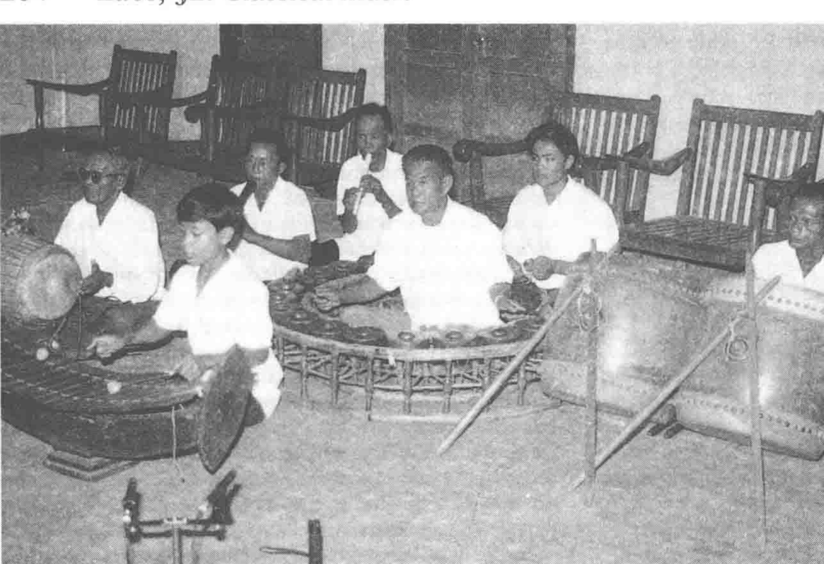
2. CLASSICAL MUSIC. The term lao deum denotes the Lao classical tradition. Classical music was exclusive to the court in Luang Prabang until 1959, when the Lao Fine Arts School in Vientiane was established to train musicians, singers, dancers, actors and actresses. Since the fall of the monarchy in 1975, only the Vientiane school has kept the classical tradition alive. Virtually banned for several years after 1975 by the Pathet Lao communist government as a symbol of bourgeois decadence and arrogance, classical music was resurrected as a respectable state symbol from about 1990. In 1992 the Fine Arts School became the National School of Folkloric Music and Dance. Because classical music is now primarily preserved within this one institution, its existence remains somewhat precarious. The musicians and dancers from Luang Prabang resettled in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1975, but they were unable to keep the tradition alive. Some performers from Vientiane resettled in Paris, but they too no longer perform. However, a classical ensemble descended from the former principality of Champassak survives nearby as a village ensemble.

In classical music the Lao classify instruments into four groups: tit (plucked), si (bowed), ti (beaten) and pao (blown). The 'beaten' instruments include two xylophones, lanat ek and lanat thoum (higher- and lower-pitched, respectively), two circular gong-chimes, khong vong nyai (lower) and khong vong noi (higher), as well as rhythmic idiophones and membranophones. There are two 'blown' instruments, the pi kaeo quadruple-reed aerophone with bulbous body and the khoui vertical duct flute. Similarly, there are two 'bowed' instruments, the so i two-string fiddle with a cylindrical body and the so ou two-string fiddle with coconut-shell body. The classical ensemble includes no plucked instruments, but the Chinese-derived khim dulcimer is sometimes used.

Two ensembles predominate, each with different names according to location. The piphat (Vientiane) or sep nyai (Luang Prabang) consists of xylophones, circular gong-chimes and quadruple-reed instrument plus drums and cymbals. The maholi (Vientiane) or sep noi (Luang Prabang) denotes an ensemble whose makeup is flexible but normally includes melodic idiophones, bowed strings, flute and percussion. A khene is sometimes added to the maholi or sep noi to make the ensemble more Lao, but there is also a discrepancy between the seven half and whole steps of the khene and the nearly equidistant seven tones of the xylophones and circular gong-chimes. Lastly, the kheuang sai ensemble consists of the two so fiddles, dulcimer, flute and percussion.

While many Lao strive to define their classical tradition as distinct, outside observers note its close relationships to those of Cambodia and Thailand, especially in terms of repertory. While it has been argued that the Khmer strongly influenced Luang Prabang during the 14th century, recordings made there in the 1960s show closer relationships to the Thai tradition. All works are pre-composed but are rarely notated. There are no melodic accents, but main beats are articulated by small bronze or brass cymbals called sing and offbeats marked by larger, flatter cymbals called sap. The pitches coinciding with the accented strokes of the sing cymbals are the most significant in defining a work's structure; pitches coinciding with unaccented strokes are of lesser importance. The way these structural pitches are realized melodically depends on each instrument's individual idiom. The higher xylophone, for example, plays continuously in octaves while the lower circular gong-chime plays a less dense, less continuous version with secondary pitches at the 4th, 5th or octave. As in the Thai and Cambodian traditions, compositions are organized in cycles of beats marked by the sing and fixed, cyclic drum patterns. A given composition can be realized at three different levels of density, called sam san (third level), song san (second level), and san dio (first level) (Table 1). A composition that includes all three levels in sequence (third, second, first) is called peng thao. The level of virtuosity depends on the skill of the players. In general, Lao classical music is played more simply than the same compositions in Thailand.



According to Mahoney's teachers (1995, p.64), Lao classical musicians classify compositions into three categories: laksana homlong, laksana moun seun and laksana sok sao. The first group, laksana homlong, include the most serious compositions, the so-called overtures, which are suites consisting of rigidly fixed, revered and spiritually-endowed pieces called peng naphat. Laksana homlong, however, also includes lighter works such as Peng Pae Sam Chan, by Thai composer LUANG PRADIT PHAIRAU. These pieces are primarily played by the piphat ensemble during ceremonies, but similar repertory is also used to accompany the masked play (khon) and dance drama (lakhon), both of Thai derivation but altered to reflect Lao sensibilities. Laksana moun seun ('happy, interesting' compositions) are lighter, more melodious, and usually played by the maholi and kheuang sai ensembles. Laksana sok sao ('sad songs') include funereal pieces of the naphat type as well as miscellaneous compositions appropriate for sad occasions.

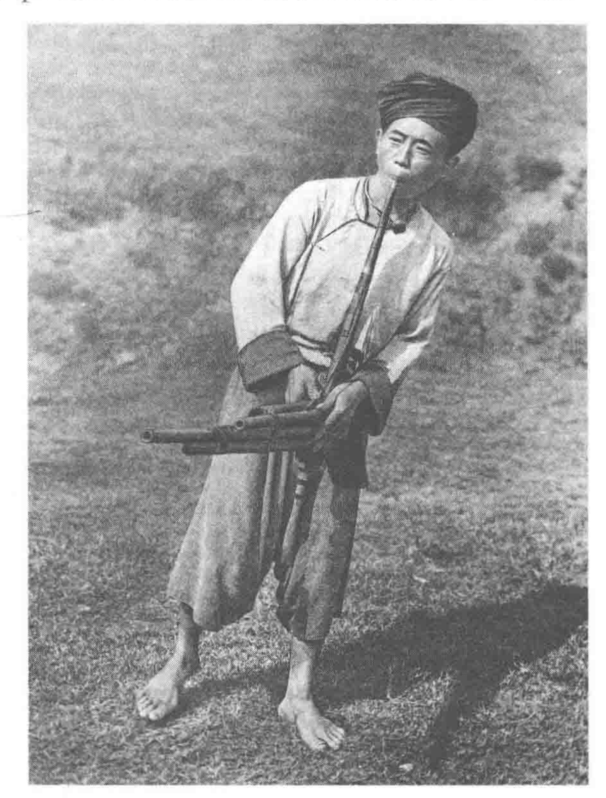
In the early 18th century, the unified Lao kingdom of Lan Xang split into the three principalities - Luang Prabang, Vientiane and Champassak, each maintaining its own classical music. Champassak declined, gradually becoming a Siamese vassal. Although the court and its accoutrements became extinct, its classical music survived among the musicians, who continued to live in nearby villages and taught the music to their sons. Remarkably, this tradition survives in a small piphat ensemble that in 1994 included seven musicians ranging in age from 18 to 83 who play xylophone, circular gong-chime, quadruple-reed aerophone, soprano recorder (in place of a khoui), a pair of barrel drums, a horizontal drum and small cymbals. The ensemble plays periodically for local festivals, especially the sacrificial buffalo feast held annually at nearby Vat Phu, an ancient Khmer temple ruin (fig.4).

3. Popular music. Considering the light concentrations of population in both the capital and the small cities along the Mekong, as well as their relative poverty, the absence of a Lao popular tradition distinct from that of Thailand is not surprising. The Lao media remain low-powered, unable to dominate the country or compete with the media of Thailand, which reach inadvertently into most parts of Laos. Since the predominant popular music emanating from north-east Thailand also derives from its own Lao-Isan culture, the Lao of Laos find this music familiar and not at all Thai. Consequently, most popular music performed inside Laos is derived from the Lao-Isan genres called luk thung, popular songs derived from local styles, and lam sing, an upbeat, post-1989 repartee genre that blends traditional styles and instruments with electrified ones and a drum kit.



4. Musics of upland peoples. The Lao classify their population into three groups: Lao Loum or lowland Lao; Lao Theung or mid-elevation dwelling Tai and Mon-Khmer speakers; and Lao Soung or high-elevation dwelling people, especially the Hmong and Yao. Lao Theung and Lao Soung are recent terms coined to replace the former (and pejorative) kha ('slave') classification. Although the population of Laos is modest at about five million, the number of differentiated ethnic groups is remarkable. Chazee (1995, p.6) lists by name 25 Tai-Kadai groups, one of which is the mainstream lowland Lao; 47 Austro-Asiatic groups; 5 Miao-Yao groups (including the Hmong); 26 Sino-Tibetan groups; and 16 others, including Burmese, Thai and Viet. Considering that mainstream Lao music itself is little studied, that Laos was closed to research from 1975 until 1990 and that most of the upland minority groups live in remote areas in the mountains or near the Vietnamese and Chinese borders, it is not surprising that little can be said at this point about their multitudinous musics.

Some upland Mon-Khmer (Austro-Asiatic) groups, such as the Loven, Lovae and Tau-oi in the Saravane area, have been acculturated into Lao society and perform a genre of lam in Lao (lam saravane). The Phou Thai style is imitated in the southern Lao genre called lam phou thai, and the music of the Lao Phouan (khap phouan) is also known, but little can be said with any certainty about the rest. Hmong music has been thoroughly documented among immigrant groups in the United States by Amy Catlin (see United States of America, §II, 5, (vi), (a)), and some anthropological studies of other groups have included sections on music, but it is difficult to state more than generalities. Although Chazee differentiates 119 ethnic groups, many are related linguistically, and it ought to be possible to reduce distinct musical types to a much lower number. Considering the paucity of people interested in Lao music, the difficulty of research and the lack of money to support any studies, attainment of this goal is unlikely in the near future. At the end of the 20th century, virtually no Lao scholars have the training or means to carry out this research.

The best-known upland people are the Hmong, called Miao in China, who after the Vietnam War migrated in large numbers to the United States, South America, Europe and elsewhere, bringing with them their much-noted needlework. Their major form of expression is poetry 'sung' in heightened speech according to lexical tones. Players of their main instrument, the gaeng free-reed mouth organ with six tubes (fig.5), imitate the same poems in a kind of surrogate speech. While many poems relate to daily life, the most important occasions for poetry and gaeng playing are the lunar New Year and funerals.

5. Buddhist music. The chant and teaching practices of Theravāda Buddhism in Laos, Thailand, Cambodia and Myanmar vary to greater or lesser extents. Ordinary Lao Buddhist chant is intoned in Pāli, an Indic sacred language, but sermons can be chanted (or sometimes nearly sung) in either Pāli or Lao. Chants in Lao are often local in style. One of the most important festivals, boun phavet, the chanting of the life of Prince Vetsandone (the penultimate life of the Buddha before enlightenment), occurs from late February to early March and can last up to three days. Lay people often sing salapan, Lao sacred poetry in stanza form sung to simple melodies. During the Vietnam War many Buddhist temples were destroyed by bombing; after 1975 Buddhism was temporarily suppressed, and many monks and other practitioners fled the country. At the end of the 20th century Buddhism had barely recovered from these events, leaving few to chant and preach.

5. Gaeng (six-tubed mouth organ) of the Hmong people

6. Relationship with musics of north-east Thailand. The majority of people in Thailand's north-east region speak Lao at home (locally called Isan). Until a government-backed development drive in the early 1970s brought Bangkok's modernization to what had been the country's most remote and poorest region, life in the north-east was not much different from that in pre-1975 Laos. With the collapse of the Lao economy following the communist coup d'état and the simultaneous modernization of Thailand stemming from its rapid economic growth and internationalization, the cultures of Isan and Laos diverged.

Before modernized Isan music surged in popularity during the 1980s, singers in southern Laos typically included the older Isan genres in their public performances. These included repartee singing called lam klawn in Isan or lam tat in Lao. Whereas most Lao genres are sung seated on the floor, Isan genres are sung standing (fig.6). A full performance consists of three sections, the first (lam thang san) beginning about 9 p.m. and lasting until about 5 a.m. Performed in metre using the san scale, each singer's portion begins with a tripartite introduction in speech rhythm, followed by the main poem in klawn form, i.e. four-line stanzas, each having seven main syllables with a required tone-mark pattern. This is followed by lam thang nyao, which lasts approximately 30 minutes and is sung in speech rhythm in the nyao scale. Without a break, the singers conclude with lam toei, also using the nyao scale but now in metre.

The second genre copied in Laos was derived from one of Isan's theatre types, lam pleun. Interestingly, while lam pleun has changed drastically in Isan through modernization and the replacement of traditional singing by luk thung pop songs, singers in Laos have preserved the original form of lam pleun but no longer in a theatrical context. Before 1975 Isan singers sometimes copied certain southern Lao genres and performed as well two local genres from near Mukdahan, lam phanya yoi and toei hua non tan, which were derived earlier from lam khon savan. After 1975 the presence of Lao singers in refugee camps in north-east Thailand brought a surge of interest in Lao styles to Thailand.

With the rise of the Isan-derived luk thung popular song since the 1960s, Isan's popular culture has come to appeal to Thai people of all regions and has penetrated Laos through the Thai media. Around 1989 a new traditionally-derived genre called lam sing quickly rose to popularity, threatening even the luk thung song genre.

6. Lam klawn singers with khene accompaniment, north-east Thailand, 1973

Lam sing (the name implies anything that is fast) incorporated repartee, khene accompaniment and some traditional song but also blended in a drum kit, rock combo instruments (including electrified phin lute), interspersed the performance with luk thung songs and often used central Thai language. Lam sing had immediate appeal to even Bangkok's youth and swept through the country. Lam sing performances may remain rare in Laos, but it is likely that only lack of money and equipment holds back the youth of Laos from adopting lam sing.

TERRY E. MILLER

Laparra, Raoul (b Bordeaux, 13 May 1876; d Suresnes, 4 April 1943). French composer. Born into an artistic family, he studied with Gédalge, Fauré, Lavignac and Diémer although his music, with its constant reference to Spanish dance, must surely owe a lot to Albéniz. He was awarded the Prix de Rome in 1903 for his cantata Alyssa, although Fauré spoke vehemently against the work. Ravel admired him, however, not least for his elegant command of the Basque language and his detailed knowledge of Spanish music, demonstrated in his extensive article 'La musique et la danse populaire en Espagne' (EMDC, I/iv, 1920, pp.2353–2400), unparalleled in its time. His early career was mostly devoted to opera. He also made a substantial contribution to the mélodie, composing songs throughout his life. As well as setting texts of his own, he returned several times to the poetry of Baudelaire and Verlaine.

In his operas and instrumental music, Laparra writes vivid Spanish pastiche, with many different kinds of dance and cante jondo. Many of the short suites of piano pieces are closely based on dance forms and scales drawn from the different regions of Spain; modal melodies, often with a flattened second, are set against simple harmony and pedal points. In the late 1920s several of the suites appeared in piano-conductor arrangements for the accompaniment of silent films. His most ambitious non-operatic work is the Poème for piano and orchestra, subtitled 'Une dimanche basque', which was commissioned by the Boston SO. Each of the four sections is preceded by a spoken narration which describes the scene evoked by the music; the piano plays more of an orchestral than a soloistic role.

Two of Laparra's operas, La habanera (1908) and La jota (1911), have dance scenes built into the librettos and deal with Latin concepts of honour and revenge. Le joueur de viole (1925) abandons the Spanish settings in favour of an allegory, in which a luthier has been trying to make an instrument where each of the four strings represents one of the seasons. His son overtakes him in the project, producing an instrument on which the strings represent the joys and trials of life. In style, Laparra's music looks back to Massenet, absorbing few of the innovations of the earlier part of the century. His book Bizet et l'Espagne (Paris, 1934) contains a critical examination of the Spanish elements in Carmen, but his study of Spanish music remains his most important contribution to musicology. Laparra met an untimely death during an air-raid.

Lap dulcimer. See APPALACHIAN DULCIMER.

Lapicida [Steinschneider], Erasmus [Rasmo] (*b c*1440–45; d Vienna, 19 Nov 1547). Composer. He may have been at least 100 years of age when he died at the Schottenkloster in Vienna. In 1510 he was appointed court composer in Elector Ludwig V's Hofkapelle in Heidelberg, a position he retained for about ten years. During this period he came into contact with Andreas Ornithoparchus who included Lapicida in his list of recognized composers in Musicae activae micrologus (Leipzig, 1517). In 1521 Lapicida was granted a benefice in the Schottenkloster, Vienna, by Archduke Ferdinand Karl of Austria, where he remained until his death. Here he met Joseph Zanger who recorded a dispute between Lapicida, Arnold von Bruck and Stephan Mahu in his Practicae musicae praecepta (Leipzig, 1554).

Lapicida's output consists primarily of motets and lieder that are transmitted in German as well as Italian sources. Several of his works survive in publications by Petrucci. These include four motets, a setting of Lamentations, the frottola La pietà ha chiusa le porte and a four-voice textless composition entitled 'Tandernaken'. The frottola combines the superius of Cara's Pietà, cara signora with the superius of Tromboncino's La pietà chiuso which becomes the tenor of the combinative piece. At Heidelberg, Lapicida composed the four-voice motet Sacerdos et pontifex. The work is dedicated to Bernhard Cles, secretary to Maximilian I and a member of the Habsburg court, and celebrates Cles's installation as Bishop of Trent in 1515. All three parts of the motet are based on a soggetto cavato derived from the words 'Bernardus Clesius episcopus tridentinus dignus est'. Other details concerning the work and its connections with Cles suggest that Lapicida may have come from Trent and not from Venice or the Netherlands as has been postulated. This would help to explain the presence of his works in both German and Italian sources. His contact with composers active in Italy (many of them Franco-Flemish) at the turn of the 16th century may also explain the use of a variety of contrapuntal techniques, such as systematized tenor patterns, imitation, stretti and other devices that distinguish Lapicida's music from the more melody-dominated, homophonic style of his Heidelberg contemporaries. Even the texts of his lieder seem to have fallen under the influence of the Italian courtly love lyric with amatory subjects preferred over those of the moralizing variety.

La Pierre, Louis-Maurice de (b Versailles, 17 Feb 1697; d Lunéville, 1 Jan 1753). French composer. He is first heard of as composer of an air published in the Ballard collection of 1722, and of two books of cantatas dated 1728. From 1729 he was in the service of Stanislas, the Duke of Lorraine and exiled King of Poland, at Chambord, and in 1737 he became Stanislas's surintendant de la musique in Lorraine. He married Thérèse Salcenska, lady-in-waiting to the Queen of Poland, in Lunéville in February 1744.

They had a son in May 1749; La Pierre died four years later and was buried in the Capuchin church at Lunéville.

Besides cantatas and cantatilles, La Pierre wrote a motet, some instrumental pieces and two stage works, divertissements for the celebration of the name days of the King and Queen of Poland. His music, characterized by graceful melodies and competent workmanship, has a certain surface charm. The cantatas show the influence of Lully.

La Pierre, Paul de (b Avignon, bap. 7 Jan 1612; d Turin, 1689). French composer, violinist and dancing-master. In 1640 he appeared in the Ballet du bureau des adresses performed before the Duke of Enghien at Dijon. He was a violinist in Avignon in 1641, together with his father Jean, and in 1643 he settled in Montpellier, where he was in charge of the violin band until 1661, taking part in numerous performances in Nîmes, Béziers, Narbonne and Pézenas. He collaborated with Molière on the Ballet des incompatibles while the Etats Généraux were in session in Montpellier in 1654–5. In 1660 he and his brother Guillaume took the band of violins and hautbois to Turin to participate in the marriage celebrations of Princess Margherita of Savoy. They both settled there in 1662, and Paul became director of the Avignon violin band (1672) and dancing-master to the king (1662) and to several members of his court. Between 1662 and 1689 he composed most of the dance tunes for ballets and operas performed at the court of Savoy. A manuscript (1665–70) preserved in the Bibliothèque Méjanes, Aix en Provence, includes two bourrées attributed to Paul de La Pierre. He was granted a pension in 1685, but continued to write choreographies and musical interludes (none of which survive) for the operas Amore vendicato by Carisio (1688), Leonida in Sparta by Sebenico (1689) and Silvio, re degli Albani by Domenico Gabrielli (1689); these were his last choreographic collaborations with his son Paolo. He married his second wife, Maddalena Lajarde, in 1639 (the marriage to his first wife was annulled in 1637). With Maddalena he had at least 11 children, including Paolo. Most of his sons were violinists, dancers and composers in Turin.

Lapis [Lapi, Lappi], Santo [Sante] (b Bologna; fl 1725–64). Italian composer. According to archival documents (I-Baf, Bas) he studied in Bologna at the S Onofrio conservatory and in 1720 was admitted to the Accademia Filarmonica as an organist. He probably left Bologna after 1724. He wrote the first two acts of the three-act dramma, La generosità di Tiberio (the third act was by Cordans) to a libretto by Minato, performed at the Teatro S Cassiano, Venice, in autumn 1729; and he partly reset Francesco Gasparini's L'amor generoso as La fede in cimento, performed during Carnival 1730, again at the S Cassiano. In 1732 he composed a cantata, Le nozze di Psiche e Cupido, for a celebration at S Marco. In 1739 he may have been in Prague, where part of the music for a production of Ginevra (libretto by Antonio Salvi) was ascribed to him. He lived in the Netherlands from about 1752 to 1756, in 1754 presenting his opera L'infelice avventurato, probably in Amsterdam (the score was once in Breitkopf's possession). Lapis seems to have been in London in 1758–60, when some instrumental music and songs by him were published there. The last record places him in Edinburgh, as harpsichordist of a visiting Italian intermezzo company which performed Pergolesi's La serva padrona in June 1763. He may have gone with the same company to York in October 1763 and to Dublin in the spring of 1764.

Laporte, André (b Oplinter, Brabant, 12 July 1931). Belgian composer. He studied with Peeters (organ) and De Jong (counterpoint) at the Lemmens Institute, Mechelen, where he won the Lemmens-Tinel Award for organ composition in 1958. He studied musicology and philosophy at the Katholieke Universiteit in Leuven (1953–7). He attended the Darmstadt summer courses from 1960 and the Cologne courses in new music (1960–65), during which he had contact with Boulez, Maderna, Berio, Ligeti, Stockhausen, Kagel and Gielen. From 1974 to 96 he taught theory and composition at the Brussels Conservatory. He was head of production at Flemish Radio and TV (1979–89) and artistic director of the BRTN RPO (1989–96). Since 1971 he has been president of the Belgian section of the ISCM.

He received numerous distinctions for his compositions, for example the Koopal award from the Belgian Ministry of Culture (1971, 1976) and the Prix Italia for his oratorio La vita non è sogno (Bologna, 1976). His opera Das Schloss, based on Kafka, was first performed at the La Monnaie Theatre in Brussels in 1986; a subsequent performance took place in Saarbrücken in 1991. His Fantasia rondino for violin and orchestra was the set piece for the 1989 Queen Elisabeth Competition. He is the jury member for several international competitions.

His eclectic musical style developed from a simple to a complex use of 12-note and other techniques. There is a strong narrative element and frequent allusions to and quotations from contemporary music.

He wrote a comedy and two librettos for Leclair, translated the works of Pope, edited literary periodicals and contributed to the Mercure de France; his published work consists chiefly of anthologies and chronicles of the Paris theatres, with valuable details of plays and operas, authors, performers and receipts.

JULIAN RUSHTON

La Pouplinière [La Popelinière], Alexandre-Jean-Joseph Le Riche de (b Chinon, Limousin, 26 July 1693; d Paris, 5 Dec 1762). French patron of music, art and literature. The son of a financier, he became a lawyer and later fermier général. The many poets, artists and musicians he befriended include Voltaire, Marmontel, the Van Loos and La Tours, Rameau and Rousseau. From about 1731 he held frequent concerts in his Paris mansion (opposite what is now the Bibliothèque Nationale) and his country estate at Passy. Up to 1753 La Pouplinière's excellent orchestra performed Rameau's own compositions under his direction, as well as those of Mondonville, and other Frenchmen and Italians; La Pouplinière developed a particular fondness for these last. J.W.A. Stamitz and Gossec later assumed the direction of the orchestra. Though not an accomplished performer, La Pouplinière played the hurdy–gurdy and guitar and composed airs (some incorporated by Rameau; see Cucuël, 288–9). A portrait of him by Carle Van Loo shows him seated holding a flute. Rameau's 'La La Poplinière' from his Pièces de clavecin en concerts (1741) pays tribute either to his devoted friend and patron or to his patron's first wife, Thérèse Des Hayes, an accomplished harpsichordist and pupil of Rameau.

MARY CYR

Lappi, Pietro (b Florence, *c*1575; d Brescia, 1630). Italian composer. He became a member of the Congregazione Fiesolana, a religious order, and spent his working life as maestro di cappella of the Madonna delle Grazie, Brescia, from about 1593 until his death. His works, whether vocal or instrumental, are all for church use. They span the period of transition from the polyphonic to the concertato style, though he tended to adhere to the former, and only one or two of his collections include motets for the more intimate scorings of the new style. Working in Brescia he was in contact with the school of instrumental musicians and instrument makers that flourished in that city. He produced a volume of canzonas in 1616 as well as contributing three others to an anthology of 1608 and including six sinfonias in his own 1614 motet collection. Like several composers at this period he sought to demonstrate his mastery of both old and new styles in the same publication: the masses of 1613 comprise two which can be sung without organ and three 'concertate a voci sole nell'organo'. The latter have more quaver movement, chordal writing and dotted rhythms in melismatic solos. The motets of 1614 show that Lappi was concerned with problems of musical form, trying out ternary and rondo schemes, with alternating solos and tuttis, while the Compline music for three and four choirs (1621) fuses antiphonal writing with the new ripieno concept of the mixed concertato. But the hymns of 1628 hark back to the previous century: he set alternate verses only and paraphrased the plainsong in a polyphonic idiom, and only the last verse of each setting is in a simple chordal style in triple time.

Lara (Aguirre del Pino), Agustín (b Mexico City, 30 Oct 1897; d Mexico City, 6 Nov 1970). Mexican songwriter. He probably composed around 700 songs, although only 420 are documented, and created a very personal style of composition that transformed urban song in Mexico and strongly influenced those of Latin America and Spain. He had no academic training, but assimilated diverse musical legacies such as the habanera, danzón, tango, foxtrot and, above all, the trova yucateca (through Guty Cárdenas) and the strongly syncopated Cuban bolero in 2/4. He converted this last style into 4/4, allowing the words to be sung without straight dependence on the rhythm. Through his lyrics he influenced popular sensibility and later composers. He used all the popular genres of his time, notably the tango (Arráncame la vida), traditional Mexican song (Xochimilco and Janitzio), waltz (Farolito, Rival, Noche de ronda and María Bonita) and ranchera songs (Aquel amor and Se me hizo fácil). His songs of Spanish genres (Granada, Madrid, Clavel sevillano and Cuerdas de mi guitarra) gained international success, but above all, his boleros (Imposible, Rosa, Aventurera, Santa, Mujer, Oración Caribe, Noche criolla, Veracruz, Palmera, Nadie and Solamente una vez) took on an original Mexican character. He sustained a remarkable public presence from 1930 until his death, through his radio programmes, work in the theatre (for which he composed the revue El pájaro de oro, 1946), the dissemination of his repertory through singers in Mexico and abroad and the regular use of his songs in films.

EDUARDO CONTRERAS SOTO

Lara, Kozma (b Durrës, 10 June 1930). Albanian composer, pianist and teacher. After early piano lessons in Durrës, he studied at the Jordan Misja Art Lyceum, Tirana (1947–9), subsequently working as a pianist for the Ensemble of the People's Army (1950–53) and at the Opera (1953–5). He also taught the piano at the Durrës elementary music school. He then resumed his studies at the Moscow Conservatory (1959–61), and, after Albania's breach with the USSR, at the newly-founded Tirana Conservatory with Zadeja (1962–4). He was head of the music department at the Ministry of Education and Culture (1964–9), head of composition at the Tirana Conservatory (1969–74) and professor of harmony and analysis at the Durrës elementary music school (1974–8). In 1978 he returned to teach at the Tirana Conservatory. From 1992 to 1997 he served as music secretary of the Albanian Union of Artists and Writers.

Committed to the enrichment of the Albanian piano literature, Lara looked for his stylistic models to Romantic composers from Chopin (the four Ballads, *c*1976–9) to Rachmaninoff (Piano Concerto no.5, 1990), although he has sometimes cleverly introduced folk or (as in the Piano Concerto no.2, 1972) political songs. His mastery of large-scale development is evident in such works as the Symphony (1965), while his ballet Fatosi partizan (1967) ranks among the most successful Albanian works in the genre. After 1991, Lara modified his writing towards a felicitous and elegant blend of post-romanticism and neo-classicism in works like Suite and Ekspresion (1999).

Larchet, John F(rancis) (b Dublin, 13 July 1884; d Dublin, 10 Aug 1967). Irish composer and educator. He received his early music education at the Royal Irish Academy of Music, where he studied with Michele Esposito. He took the BMus (1915) and DMus (1917) at the University of Dublin and in 1920 he was appointed to the Staff of the RIAM, where he succeeded Esposito as senior professor of composition, harmony and counterpoint. Larchet was director of music at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, from 1907 to 1934, where his responsibilities included writing incidental music. In 1921 he succeeded C.H. Kitson as professor of music at University College, Dublin. He occupied this chair, which became a full-time appointment in 1944, until 1958. Larchet also taught music in a number of Dublin schools, and he served as principal examiner for the Irish Department of Education and for the local centre examinations of the RIAM. As music adviser to the Irish army after 1923, he was influential in the development of the Army School of Music. Larchet was also founding president and musical director of the Dublin Grand Opera Society (1941), which superseded the Dublin Operatic Society, and vice-president of Trinity College of Music, London. The National University of Ireland awarded him the honorary DMus in 1953 and in 1958 he was decorated with the order of Commendatore by the Italian government. In 1995 the first John F. Larchet Memorial Lecture was delivered by Joseph Kerman as the keynote address at the Maynooth International Musicological Conference.

Larchet's career – as composer, professor, teacher of composition, choral conductor, and not least as a gentle but persuasive advocate of an outward-looking cosmopolitan aesthetic – was dedicated to one end: the fostering of music as a vital dynamic, artistic and educational, within the emergent nation state of Ireland. He moulded a steady stream of composers, musicians and teachers, without whom the history of art music in Ireland would be considerably the poorer. Larchet sought to overcome both the 'art-ethnic' divide, during the first flush of the Celtic revival in the early part of the century, and the cultural stagnation which he so deplored between 1920 and 1950. His ambiguous response to Yeats is especially expressive of the quandary in which he found himself, writing incidental music to a number of his plays at the Abbey Theatre, while at the same time challenging Yeats's phrase, and the widespread indifference to it, 'As for the peasant, he has his songs and his music'. As a composer the greater part of Larchet's small output is given over to the fastidious arrangement of Irish airs. Many of the arrangements derive from his theatre work, and he rescored some of them, including the Lament for Youth and the Dirge of Ossian in later years. Some of his compositions share an affinity with the work of his contemporary Hamilton Harty. For instance, By the Waters of Moyle (1957) is an arrangement of a traditional ari adn Harty based his orchestral suite The Children of Liv (1938) on the same melody. The several songs that Larchet wrote contain the best examples of his original voice; a few still find a place in the Irish concert repertory. In particular, Padraig the Fiddiler brought him international fame in a recording by John McCormack, accompanied by Edwin Schneider and Kreisler. His Bluebeard's Castle, a ballet score composed for Ninette de Valois at the Abbey Theatre, is an extensive work which deserves greater recognition, as too do his choral works and arrangements and especially the incidental music.

Larchier, Federicus (fl ?1543). Composer who may be identifiable with JEAN LARCHIER.

Larchier [Larcier], Jean [Johannes] (fl ?1543–1555). French or Franco-Flemish composer. Three motets and four chansons by him were published in collections in Antwerp and Leuven between 1544 and 1555. He may be the same man as the Jean Larcher or 'Jean Achez' who was listed as a singer in the Ste Chapelle in Paris in 1521, and who later became chaplain to King Henri II between 1547 and 1550. However, all his surviving music was composed in the style of the Flemish school of Gombert, Clemens and Crecquillon.

He may be identifiable with the Federicus Larchier to whom one chanson (written in the largely homophonic manner of Sandrin) is attributed in a collection published in Lyons in 1543.

FRANK DOBBINS

Lardenois, Antoine (b Paris; d ?Dax, 1672 or later). French composer. He lived at Nîmes at least from 1651 to 1653, possibly to about 1658; he figures in the records of the consistory there. On 14 August 1652 he abjured Catholicism and in spite of his quarrelsome nature received financial aid from his protectors there towards a journey to Geneva in March and April 1653 to arrange for the publication of a volume of music. In November 1653 he sought but failed to gain the appointment to the dual post of janitor of the college and singer at the little temple at Nîmes. In 1657, with support from the Protestants at Nîmes, he offered his solmization method to the Protestants of La Rochelle. Lardenois continued his career as a musician in Paris, where on 27 January 1660 he abjured the reformed faith. He later became choirmaster of Dax Cathedral. His name appears for the last time in the chapter records in 1672, when it was recorded that he had been troubling his colleagues with 'grandes injures at autres emportements'.

Lardenois devised a simplified solmization method that he adapted to the Protestant psalter to make it easier to read and use. His method reduces the notation to a single system, with a single (C) clef and a signature of one flat and with a fixed doh, starting on fa (= ut); it freely makes use of the note si but places it at the interval mi-fa. The first edition of his Les psaumes de David, mis en rime française par Clément Marot et Théodore de Bèze, réduits tout nouvellement à une bonne et facile méthode pour apprendre le chant ordinaire de l'église (Geneva, 1651) is lost (2/1657, with a slightly different title-page and a sheet of music illustrating his method; subsequent edns., 1659 and 1662, and others later in the 17th century). At this period the Paraphrase des pseaumes de David, en vers françois by Antoine Godeau was becoming known to the public in settings by Louis XIII, Jacques de Gouy and Aux Cousteaux. This version of the psalms received a warm welcome, above all from Protestants who could sing it without running the risk involved with using Marot's paraphrases. Lardenois in his turn took it up and at his own expense (or perhaps that of the church at Nîmes) published his Paraphrase … de Godeau, nouvellement mise en musique (Paris, 1655, 2/1658/R). The chronicler Loret in La muze historique for 31 January 1660 reported that Lardenois' settings were being sung by Protestants throughout France. The melodies that he adapted for them are for the most part derived from those used in the Huguenot Psalter.

DENISE LAUNAY/JAMES R. ANTHONY

Laredo, Jaime (Eduardo) (b Cochabamba, 7 June 1941). American violinist of Bolivian birth. His family moved to the USA when he was seven to enable him to further his musical training, and he was taught by Ivan Galamian at the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia. After making his professional début at the age of 11, with the San Francisco SO, he toured Latin America on a number of occasions. In 1959 he became the youngest winner of the Queen Elisabeth Competition, Brussels, and the same year he appeared with the Philadelphia and Cleveland Orchestras. His career as an adult violinist began with a much-praised Carnegie Hall recital in October 1960; he also received the New York City Handel Medallion that year. Laredo has performed throughout the USA and Europe, and made his London début at the Royal Albert Hall in 1961. He was a frequent visitor to the Marlboro Festival, and his recording of Beethoven's Triple Concerto with Serkin, Parnas and the Marlboro Festival Orchestra well represents his style. Laredo is an aristocratic and predominantly lyrical performer; he is not as demonstrative as other Galamian pupils, but his clean intonation and meticulous phrasing make him valuable as an ensemble player – he was a member of the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center, directs the 'Chamber Music at the 92nd Street Y' series and has recorded (as a violist) piano quartets with Stern, Ma and Ax. Since 1977 he has frequently appeared and recorded with the Scottish Chamber Orchestra as guest conductor, also forming close relations with the St Paul Chamber Orchestra and the English Chamber Orchestra. He owns a 1717 violin by Stradivari known as the 'Ex-Gariel'. A series of Bolivian airmail stamps issued in his honour bore his portrait and the notes A, D and C (La-re-do).

RICHARD BERNAS

Laredo [née Meckler], Ruth (b Detroit, MI, 20 Nov 1937). American pianist. She studied at the Curtis Institute with Rudolf Serkin, and made her orchestral début with Stokowski and the American SO at Carnegie Hall in 1962. She has appeared with many of the major orchestras in the USA and toured widely as a soloist; she has played much of the chamber music repertory and has participated regularly in the Mostly Mozart, Marlboro, Aspen, Caramoor and Spoleto festivals. She is particularly known for her recordings of the complete solo piano works of Rachmaninoff and the complete piano sonatas and preludes of Skryabin, which helped to revive interest in that composer in the USA. She has held teaching positions at SUNY, Binghamton (1972–3), Kent State University (1969–71) and the Yale School of Music (1977–9). She has contributed many articles on piano repertory and technique to Keyboard Magazine, and has edited Rachmaninoff piano works.

ELLEN HIGHSTEIN

Largamente (It.: 'broadly', 'generously'). Though strictly the adverb from LARGO, this word is rather different in its uses. It is used as an expression mark to denote a more stately manner of playing; or it can be an instruction to slow down the tempo. In this second sense it was a particular favourite of Elgar, who found it so indispensable that in some of his works he even abbreviated it to L (together with A for accelerando and R for ritardando); see especially the scores of the Second Symphony and The Kingdom.

DAVID FALLOWS

Large (Lat. larga, maxima). In western notation the longest note value of medieval and Renaissance music. First found in late 13th-century music, its value was twice or three times that of a long, and it was usually shown as in ex.1*a*.

Ex.1

(a) or (b) or

Its rest was usually shown as a multiple of the long-rest, the precise form depending on the binary or ternary division of both the large and the long (ex.1*b*). The large survived into the period of 'white' or 'void' notation (post-1450), although its use in the Renaissance was restricted mainly to the notation of tenor parts and other cantus firmi. It is mentioned in writings as late as Christopher Simpson's Compendium of Practical Musick (1667), although by this date its existence was purely theoretical. Indeed, Simpson stated that 'The Large and Long are now of little use, being too long for any Voice, or Instrument (the Organ excepted) to hold out to their full length'. Some sources use the term 'duplex longa' as an alternative term for the (imperfect) large.

JOHN MOREHEN/RICHARD RASTALL

Larghetto (It.: 'rather wide'; diminutive of largo). A tempo mark indicating a rather more lighthearted largo. 'Handel's Largo' ('Ombra mai fù' from Serse) is marked larghetto, as are many other movements in the same opera; in his Messiah, 'Comfort ye' is marked larghetto e piano, 'For behold' is andante larghetto, and 'The people that walked in darkness' is larghetto. The word seems to have come into use early in the 18th century: Brossard (1703) did not mention it; but Rousseau (1768, article 'Mouvement') gave it as one of the main adjustments of tempo (though not of mood) and described it (article 'Largo') as being 'a little less slow than largo'. Koch (1802) said it was 'normally the same as andante'. On the other hand, Cartier (1798) gave larghetto as slower than adagio and slower than any mark except largo.

For bibliography see TEMPO AND EXPRESSION MARKS.

DAVID FALLOWS

Largo (It.: 'large', 'broad'). A tempo mark, considered by many theorists of the 18th century, particularly in France, to be the slowest of all: Rousseau (1768) listed it as the slowest of his five main degrees of movement in music, and many other writers agreed with him; but there is no overall consistency of opinion among earlier writers about its relation to such designations as adagio, lento and grave. Early Italian writers and 19th-century usage seem to have been more consistent in placing it somewhere between adagio and andante: it was surely in this sense that Bach had used it for the opening fugue of his B minor Mass and the final fugue in book 1 of the '48'; and Vivaldi had used the direction largo ma più tosto andante (P211/RV227).

Largo appeared relatively often in music from the beginning of the 17th century, though normally to indicate a contrast in tempo within a faster movement. Caccini (Le nuove musiche, 1601/2/R) included an instruction 'escla con misura più larga'; Frescobaldi (Partite e toccate, 1615) recommended a tempo largo for runs and embellishments; and a similar usage in Giovanni Scipione (1650) endorses the conclusion that for them, at least, largo was already more a tempo than an affect. Praetorius (Syntagma musicum, iii, 2/1619/R) gave the equation adagio: largo: lento: langsam. In the late 17th and early 18th centuries the term was commonly applied to third movements, in 3/2 time and saraband rhythm, of sonate da chiesa.

In England largo may have had a firmer position similar to that of andante in later centuries. Purcell, in the preface to his Sonnata's of III Parts (1683), gave largo, along with presto largo and poco largo, as the moderate tempo between adagio and allegro; and the anonymous A Short Explication (London, 1724) gave the progression adagio, grave, largo, vivace, allegro, presto.

Brossard's Dictionaire (1703), followed by J.G. Walther's Musicalisches Lexicon (1732), gave an interesting description of largo:

> Very slowly as though expanding the beat, and often marking the major accents unusually, etc. This happens above all in the Recitative of the Italians, in which one often does not make the beats equal because it is a kind of declamation in which the actor must follow the movement of the passion which affects him and which he wishes to express instead of following that of an equal and regulated beat.

'Handel's Largo' ('Ombra mai fù' from Serse) is actually marked larghetto.

DAVID FALLOWS

La Riche [Le Riche], François (b ?Tournai, ?1662; d ?Tournai, ? after 1732). ?Flemish oboist and composer. He popularized the oboe in England and Germany. He may have been born in Tournai in 1662 (FürstenauG). In 1685 he was appointed one of the 'Bases' (bass violinist and/or bassoonist) at the court of James II. When James fled in 1688, La Riche, a Roman Catholic, was not reappointed to the court, although he was among the five 'hoboys' who accompanied William III to the Netherlands in 1691. He then seems to have returned to London to work as a freelance musician. For James Talbot's manuscript (*c*1692–5) he was the supplier of a double curtal and a serpent and two oboe fingering charts; he and James Paisible were to have provided the flute chart. In 1697 he and Jeremiah Clarke (i) were stewards at the St Cecilia's Day feast, for which La Riche wrote an overture and nine dances in the French style (GB-Lbl Add.35043).

In 1699 La Riche became an oboist with the title Kammermusicus at the Dresden court. He also acted as an agent in the purchase of foreign goods, including jewellery and horses, which would explain his remarkably high salary (3200 thaler per annum). In 1700 he took part in the wedding celebrations in Berlin of the Crown Prince of Hesse-Cassel and the Princess of Brandenburg; Telemann heard him perform in two operas in Berlin around 1702. He was the first-named of the oboists to whom Telemann dedicated his Kleine Cammer-Music (1716), at least one and probably all three of the others being his German pupils. He had retired by 1727, when Quantz reported that La Riche gave him a letter of credit for a visit to London. His servant was a witness to the will of Peter Bressan, made in 1731 in Tournai, to which city La Riche had presumably returned. He is last mentioned in the Dresden records in 1733.

Larigot (Fr.). See under ORGAN STOP.

Larin, Sergey (b Daugavpils, Latvia, 9 March 1953). Russian tenor. After linguistic studies in Gor′kiy (now Nizhniy Novgorod) and singing lessons in Vilnius, he made his début at the Lithuanian Opera and Ballet Theatre, as Alfredo, in 1981. His Western début did not take place until 1990, when he appeared as Lensky at the Vienna Staatsoper; but unlike some compatriots he has not concentrated primarily on Russian roles: his calling cards at major houses in Western Europe have included Don José, Calaf and Don Carlos (which he sang at the 1998 Salzburg Festival), and his non-Russian repertory also includes the Prince (Rusalka) and Florestan. It was in Carmen that he made his Covent Garden début in 1991. He has sung three roles in Boris Godunov, beginning as the Simpleton, moving on to Shuysky and finally assuming the Pretender with the Kirov Opera at the Metropolitan in 1992 and at the 1994 Salzburg Festival. That Salzburg production has been preserved on disc, and his other important recordings include Calaf (on disc and video), Andrey in Tchaikovsky's Mazepa and a disc of Russian songs. Larin is a highly expressive performer, possessed of a heroically charged tenor tone which he is capable of scaling down as the situation demands. His portrayals of complex characters and the internalized drama he finds in the song repertory suggest that he belongs to the old, psychological tradition of Russian theatre.

JOHN ALLISON

Larmanjat, Jacques (b Paris, 19 Oct 1878; d Paris, 7 Nov 1952). French composer. He studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Albert Lavignac and André Gédalge. He began to publish work in 1905 but first attracted wider attention with the production of his opera Gina in Nice in 1912. From 1918 to 1928 he worked for Pleyel on the development of the Pleyela, the mechanical piano perfected by the company, for which he made a huge number of transcriptions. He collaborated with Stravinsky, adapting works by him for this instrument, and he was also responsible for the French translation of Mavra. Later he took important posts at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, at Gaveau, the French firm of piano and harpsichord makers, and at French radio. His deep love of Brittany inspired several of his works and from 1935 to 1945 he was director of the Rennes Conservatoire.

Larmanjat's ballets are the best proof of a natural theatrical talent in which he could give free rein to an imaginative lightness of touch and a taste for fantasy and humour. The composer of numerous mélodies, notably on poems by Léon-Paul Fargue and Francis Carco, he had a facility for the chanson and was interpreted by artists such as Fréhel and Lucienne Boyer, who made his Doux caboulot famous. He also composed piano music and symphonic works characterized by rhythmic vivacity and stylistic elegance.

Larmore, Jennifer (b Atlanta, GA, 21 June 1958). American mezzo-soprano. She studied at Westminster Choir College at Princeton with R.H. McIvor, and privately with John Bullock and Regina Resnik. She sang in the European première of Menotti's The Egg at Spoleto in 1977 and made her official début as Mozart's Sextus at Nice in 1986. Since then she has built an impressive reputation in the operas of Handel, Mozart and Rossini. Larmore made her Covent Garden début as Rosina in 1992 and her first appearance at La Scala, as Isolier (Le comte Ory), in the same year. Her Metropolitan début, as Rosina, followed in 1995. Her full, flexible mezzo and forthright characterization can be heard on her recordings of the title roles of Giulio Cesare and La Cenerentola, as Rosina in Il barbiere di Siviglia and as Arsace in Semiramide. She is a lively and persuasive actress.

ALAN BLYTH

Larner, Sam [Samuel James] (b Winterton, Norfolk, 1878; d 11 Sept 1965). English traditional singer. Born into a fishing community, he was one of nine children. He worked at sea from the ages of 12 to 55, where he acquired a sizable repertory of songs from his father and fellow herring fishermen. The latter included Jimmy Sutton ('Old Larpin') whose songs had been noted by the composer and folksong collector E.J. Moeran in 1915. Discovered and recorded by BBC producer Philip Donnellan in 1958, Larner was subsequently invited to sing at the Singers Club in London by Ewan MacColl and Peggy Seeger. By then, he had a diverse repertory of about 60 songs including broadside versions of traditional ballads, as well as sea, parlour and historical songs. Larner was extensively recorded by MacColl, Seeger and the BBC radio producer Charles Parker for the Prix d'Italia prizewinning radio-ballad documentary Singing the Fishing originally broadcast in 1960. Larner was a 'showman singer' who performed with his left hand cupped to his ear and occasionally executed a few jig steps. His personality endeared him to members of the Folk Revival as well as to local audiences (see ENGLAND, §II, 2).

DAVE ARTHUR

Laro, Kujtim (b Vlora, 8 May 1947). Albanian composer. He studied the cello and the double bass with his brother at the Jordan Misja Art Lyceum, Tirana (1961–5). He then entered the Tirana Conservatory, where from 1965 to 1971 he studied composition with Zadeja, counterpoint with Ibrahimi and analysis with Kozma Lara. He then worked at Radio Tirana (1971–5) while teaching composition at the conservatory. For 15 years he was director of the Ensemble of the People's Army (1975–90).

Laro was one of the first composers to study exclusively in Albania after the country's breach with the USSR, and his work continued for some time to favour the national historical subjects commonly used by Albanian artists at that time, commemorating such events as the 1912 independence (in the Balladë për Ismail Qemali, 1987, which honours the head of the first Albanian government) and the 1920 conflicts in Vlora (in the Balladë për Selam Musanë, 1982). Mostly epic and dramatic in character, his music is meticulously worked out, interrelating seemingly disparate motivic elements within a framework of broad gestures; he often draws on rhythmic elements from the folk music of Vlora and Labëria, as well as on partisan songs, subtly harmonized. In the 1990s, apart from composing songs, he shifted successfully to an often atonal chamber music, producing works rich in vivid gestures if not dramatic.

GEORGE LEOTSAKOS

La Roche, François de (d Vaux, 23 Dec 1676). French composer and singer. The records show that François de La Roche, an haute-contre, was one of the eight 'chantres ordinaires de la musique' in the ensemble of Gaston d'Orléans, brother of Louis XIII, and took part in the divertissements performed at the prince's court in the 1650s. After his patron's death in 1661 he entered the service of the surintendant Fouquet. He published five books of airs de cours in three and four parts (in 1648, 1649, 1652, 1655 and 1658), of which only the haute-contre, tenor and bass parts are extant. The first book is dedicated to the chaplain of Gaston d'Orléans, and the third to the prince himself. His airs (airs sérieux and a few airs à boire) are in the same tradition as those of Jean de Cambefort, published at the same period. A solo air by him is contained in the collection Airs de cour et airs à boire (F-Pn dated 1645–80). (C. Massip: 'Le Mécénat musical de Gaston d'Orléans', L'âge d'or du mécénat (1598–1661): Paris 1983, ed. R. Mousnier and J. Mesnard (Paris, 1985), 383–91)

DAVID TUNLEY/CATHERINE MASSIP

Laroche, Herman [Larosh, German Avgustovich] (b St Petersburg, 13/25 May 1845; d St Petersburg, 5/18 Oct 1904). Russian music critic. After studying the piano with Dubuque in Moscow, he became a student at the St Petersburg Conservatory (1862–6), where his teachers included Rubinstein and Zaremba. He taught theoretical and historical topics at the Moscow Conservatory (1867–70, and again in the 1880s) and at St Petersburg (in the 1870s). He published material about music from 1867 until the year of his death, and wrote extensively on Russian and other literature and current affairs. His work appeared under his own name, pseudonymously and anonymously, in a large number of periodicals based in both the Russian capitals, with music strongly represented in his contributions to Russkiy vestnik, Sovremennaya letopis', Moskovskiye vedomosti and Golos. Laroche reviewed operatic premières and concerts, evaluated new works, chronicled events and discussed musical issues in a more philosophical vein. While Russian music features conspicuously, Laroche's work reveals a wide-ranging interest in the European musical world, and displays a cosmopolitanism unusual in Russian criticism of the time. There are similarities with the outlook of his student contemporary and lifelong friend Tchaikovsky: they shared a passionate enthusiasm for Mozart, delighted in modern French music and took a detached view of the principles and achievements of Wagner and Liszt. Laroche's opinions reflected his academic training, and left him deaf to the virtues of works produced outside that tradition, notably those of Musorgsky; he considered that Russian music bore traces of the nation's history, which the Renaissance had bypassed, and that musicians could eliminate the resulting backwardness only by studying the counterpoint of Palestrina and his precursors. Sergey Taneyev's indebtedness to his teacher is shown by the style and expertise of his compositions as well as by his dedication to Laroche of his Podvizhnoy kontrapunkt strogogo pis'ma ('Invertible counterpoint in the strict style', Leipzig and Moscow, 1909). As early as 1866 Laroche detected the extraordinary potential as a composer of Tchaikovsky, whose champion he generally remained, while displaying hostility to the activities of the Balakirev circle. Tchaikovsky in turn was aware of his friend's gifts, but in 1878 expressed regret that Laroche's powers were often not channelled into disciplined, systematic effort. Laroche's views had much in common with those of Hanslick, as may be seen especially in his translator's preface to the latter's Vom Musikalisch-Schönen; in this regard Laroche was conscious of being a lone voice in Russia. Although in certain respects more backward-looking in his tastes than Hanslick, Laroche was far more sympathetic to Russian music. Of particular importance among his voluminous output are the extended essay on Glinka of 1867–8 which made his name, and his writings about Tchaikovsky, in particular Chaykovsky kak dramaticheskiy kompozitor ('Tchaikovsky as a dramatic composer') of 1894. Laroche's work offers a rare combination of erudition and profound technical understanding of music with a compelling literary style.

Larrauri, Antón (b Bilbao, 30 April 1932). Basque composer. His first contact with music was as a boy soprano in El Camelo de Begoña choir in Bilbao. He had his first music lessons with his brother Laureano, then studied with Father José Domingo Ugartetxea, Víctor Zubizarreta and Julio Valdés. After that he was self-taught, and his first works were published at a relatively mature age. He took degrees in philosophy and literature while teaching Classical languages. From 1960 to 71 he was music critic for El correo español in Bilbao. The first performance of his orchestral works Dédalo and Apokatástasis took place in Bilbao in 1968. These were followed by Contingencias (1971), also for orchestra, and Ezpatadantza (1972), for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, both of which were chosen to represent Spain at UNESCO's International Tribune of Composers in Paris. From then on the success of his music spread rapidly throughout Spain. He won several competition prizes, including the Silver Harp prize for Aitxa, and his choral work Illun was selected for the RAI's Prix Italia. He was also in demand at musical centres and solicited by the main musical institutions in Spain.

Larrauri favours large choral and orchestral ensembles where the concept of sound density is predominant. His music, which has shown hardly a trace of aesthetic evolution over the years, develops out of great blocks of sound (used even in instrumental, chamber or electro-acoustic music) which interrelate by means of violent contrasts in dynamics, density and timbre. This dialectical opposition provides a basis for the formal structure of the music and at the same time ensures an expressive climate of a powerful, elemental and dramatic quality. The use of elements drawn from Basque folk music (rhythms, certain melodic phrases, intervallic cells, instrumental timbres) contributes to the music's somewhat archaic character.

CARLOS VILLASOL

Larrivée, Henri (b Lyons, 9 Jan 1737; d Paris, 7 Aug 1802). French baritone. At first a singer in the Opéra chorus, he began his career as a soloist in 1755 when he played a High Priest in Rameau's Castor et Pollux; later he sang Jupiter and finally Pollux. Apart from other roles in operas of Rameau and Lully, he created Ricimer in Philidor's Ernelinde (1767) and the title role in Gossec's Sabinus (1773). For Gluck he sang Agamemnon (in Iphigénie en Aulide), Hercules (in Alceste), Ubalde (in Armide) and Orestes (in Iphigénie en Tauride); he also played Orestes in Piccinni's Iphigénie, Grétry's Andromaque and Lemoyne's Electre. He venerated Gluck (although the composer criticized his acting) and overcame a lack of sympathy with Piccinni to sing Roland with such success as to give rise to Framery's 'Epître à M. Larrivée' (Journal de Paris, 4 February 1778). Subsequently he created Danaus in Salieri's Les Danaïdes (1784). He last appeared as Agamemnon in 1797. He had a wide range and a flexible voice which, according to Fétis and others, became nasal on high notes.

Larrivée's wife, Marie Jeanne Larrivée (née Le Mière) (b Sedan, 29 Nov 1733; d Paris, Oct 1786), was a soprano who appeared at the Opéra from 1750, mostly in minor roles; but she created the title role of Philidor's Ernelinde (1767) and Eponine in Gossec's Sabinus (1773).

JULIAN RUSHTON

Larrocha (y de la Calle), Alicia de (b Barcelona, 23 May 1923). Spanish pianist. She gave her first recital at the age of four, studied with Frank Marshall (a pupil of Granados) at the Academia Marshall in Barcelona and made her first orchestral appearance, in Mozart's 'Coronation' Concerto K537, with the Madrid SO at the age of 11. She first toured outside Spain in 1947, made her Wigmore Hall début in 1953 and first appeared in the USA, with the Los Angeles SO, in 1955. In 1959 she became director of the Academia Marshall. After a ten-year absence she returned to America, giving recitals in New York and Chicago. By this time she was increasingly recognized as a peerless exponent of the Spanish repertory, and her performances of Albéniz's Iberia and Granados's Goyescas, in the USA and elsewhere, won particular praise. She has recorded Iberia four times, while her recordings of the same composer's La vega and Azulejos are equally beguiling. If Spanish music, including works by Falla, Turina (particularly his Sanlucar de Barrameda) and Mompou, forms the cornerstone of her repertory, she has also performed and recorded music by many other composers, notably Mozart, for whom she retains a special affection. Her performances, particularly in the Spanish repertory, combine a magisterial strength with a rare command of colour, texture and rhythm. She has given the premières of several Spanish works, including book 4 of Mompou's Música callada (1972) and Montsalvatge's Concierto breve (1953), which is dedicated to her.

BRYCE MORRISON

Larsen, Jens Peter (b Copenhagen, 14 June 1902; d Copenhagen, 22 Aug 1988). Danish musicologist. He studied mathematics (1920–21) and musicology at Copenhagen University and between Hammerich's retirement (1922) and Abrahamsen's appointment there (1924) had private tuition in organ playing from Wöldike and music history from Laub, taking the organ examination at the Royal Danish Conservatory (1923); subsequently he resumed his study of musicology at the university (MA 1928). He then began a distinguished teaching career there, being appointed lecturer (1939), professor of musicology (1945) and director of the Institute for Musicology (1949–65); he retired in 1970. He was visiting professor at the University of California, Berkeley (1961), the University of Wisconsin (1971–2), the University of Vienna (1974), Rochester University, New York (1974, 1983) and the John F. Kennedy Center, Washington, DC (1975).

Larsen's first main interest was Haydn, and for more than 40 years he occupied a leading position in Haydn scholarship. In his Die Haydn-Überlieferung (1939), for which he received the doctorate of Copenhagen University, he meticulously investigated questions of authenticity and established a canon on which subsequent research and the publication of a Haydn edition were based. He was general editor of the Haydn Society edition (1949–51) and the collected edition prepared under the auspices of the Joseph Haydn-Institut, Cologne (1955–60), as well as chairman of the International Haydn Conference in Washington, DC (1975). In Handel's Messiah (1957) he again considered the problem of authenticity and, by a careful identification of copyists' handwriting and other palaeographical evidence, made a valuable contribution to the ordering of Handelian sources. He served on the board of directors of the Halle G.-F. Händel-Gesellschaft (from 1955) and the council of the Göttingen Händel-Gesellschaft (from 1967), and was awarded the City of Halle Handel Prize (1965) and the gold medals of the Göttingen Händel-Gesellschaft (1972) and the City of Vienna (1983). He also worked on Mozart and on general issues, particularly to do with changes of form and style between the Baroque and Classical periods.

In the field of Danish music Larsen wrote about and edited music by C.E.F. Weyse, but more important were his contributions on behalf of Danish church music: he was organist of Vangede Church (1930–45) and lecturer on church music at the Pastoral Seminary (1933–71), and his work as an editor, with Wöldike and others, includes a number of publications of liturgical music for use in Danish churches, the music of the standard Danish hymnbook, Den danske koralbog (1954, 3/1992), and the Nordisk koralbog (1961). He was elected a member of the Royal Danish Academy of Sciences and Letters in 1960 and was awarded honorary membership of the Hungarian Academy in 1976.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Larsen [Reece], Libby [Elizabeth] (Brown) (b Wilmington, DE, 24 Dec 1950). American composer. She studied at the University of Minnesota (BA 1971, MM 1975, PhD 1978), where her teachers included Argento, Paul Fetler and Eric Stokes. Determined to find a role for the composer outside academe, in 1973 she co-founded, with the composer Stephen Paulus, the Minnesota Composers Forum (known as the American Composers Forum since 1996). From the 1983–4 season to 1987 Larsen was composer-in-residence with the Minnesota Orchestra, for which she has composed several works, including Symphony no.1 (1985, later revised), subtitled 'Water Music', Ghosts of an Old Ceremony (1991) – a music theatre piece for orchestra, ten dancers and video – and the Piano Concerto ('Since Armstrong', 1991). Larsen has also been resident composer for the Charlotte (North Carolina) SO and the Colorado Springs SO.

A strong advocate of issues such as music education and women in music, Larsen has been a visiting professor and guest lecturer at numerous institutions. She has served on the music panel of the NEA and the managing board of the ASOL, and has been vice-president of the AMC. Rising to prominence in America during the 1980s and 90s, she has received many awards, including the NEA fellowship and a 1994 Grammy award for her production of The Art of Arleen Augér, which includes her song cycle Sonnets from the Portuguese (1991).

Adventurous without being self-consciously avant-garde, Larsen has written in all genres. Her style is noted for its energy, optimism, rhythmic diversity, colourful orchestration, liberated tonality without harsh dissonance, and pervading lyricism. Although she has written abundantly for orchestras and mixed ensembles, she is attracted in particular to the qualities of the voice – in this she betrays the influence of Argento. Outstanding in her numerous songs and choral works is her keen inflection of both prose and poetry. Her eclectic sources tend towards first-person settings, as in Me, containing fragments of Brenda Ueland's autobiography, Mary Cassatt (1844–1926), seven songs for mezzo soprano, solo trombone and orchestra, performed with projections of the artist's paintings; and Eleanor Roosevelt, a dramatic cantata for singers and spoken voices. Although not a radical feminist, in the quest for an understanding of human progress which informs her operas and songs, Larsen has dealt extensively with female subjects from women pioneers of the American West to characters created by Virginia Woolf.

Libby Larsen

Of her operas, Frankenstein: the Modern Prometheus (1990) draws a parallel between alchemy and nuclear research and proceeds from the premise that film and video editing have altered the audience's perception and sense of time; the continuous drama flows cinematically in a prologue and 14 compressed scenes. The small orchestra used in this work incorporates electronically mixed sounds. A second work, Eric Hermannson's Soul (1998), dramatizes Willa Cather's short story of the struggle between the love for music and religious zealotry among Norwegian settlers in a village on the remote Nebraska plains of the 1880s. Under the spell of a fundamentalist preacher, the protagonist Hermannson abandons his fiddle-playing. Each segment of the community is vividly represented by a distinct music: the Hardanger fiddle tunes of the immigrant musician; the verismo opera (a fragment of Cavalleria rusticana) beloved of the genteel city girl who helps him understand that music is essential to the human spirit; and the gospel songs of the church congregation. The score exemplifies how Larsen incorporates the vernacular into her free-wheeling style.

MARY ANN FELDMAN

Larsén-Todsen, Nanny (b Hagby, 2 Aug 1884; d Stockholm, 26 May 1982). Swedish soprano. She studied in Stockholm, Berlin and Milan and made her début in 1906 with the Swedish Royal Opera, where she continued to sing until 1923, first in lyric roles, including Donna Anna, Reiza, Aida, Tosca and the Marschallin, before taking on the heavier Wagner repertory. At La Scala (1923–4) she sang Isolde under Toscanini; at the Metropolitan (1925–7) she made her début as Brünnhilde (Götterdämmerung) and, in addition to Wagner, sang Leonore, Rachel (La Juive) and Gioconda. At Covent Garden (1927 and 1930) she sang Brünnhilde, while at Bayreuth (1927–31) her roles were Isolde, Kundry and Brünnhilde. Most notable of her recordings are her Isolde, based on Bayreuth performances of 1928, and Brünnhilde's Immolation Scene from the same year, which show her strong, evenly produced tone and appreciable sensitivity.

LEO RIEMENS/ALAN BLYTH

Larson brothers. American makers of fretted instruments. Carl (b 31 Dec 1867; d 4 Sept 1946) and August (b 24 April 1873; d 16 June 1944) Larson emigrated from Sweden to Chicago during the 1880s, and began making instruments in the 1890s. Their guitars were exclusively designed to be fitted with steel strings at a time when almost every other guitar maker used gut. Mandolins of the period were successfully made with steel strings to produce a loud sound. No other American maker before the Larsons had considered the strengthening and modification of construction that a guitar specifically designed for steel strings would require. August Larson obtained a US patent in 1904 for the distinctive laminated braces the Larsons used under their guitar tops. A later Larson design had metal rods within the guitar's body to provide even greater internal strength. The brothers primarily manufactured guitars, harp-guitars and mandolins with a variety of brand names, including Champion, Dyer, Euphonon, Maurer, Prairie State, Stahl and Stetson. Their Dyer Symphony harp-guitars, based on a design by Chris Knutsen and made in the 1910s and 20s, are among their finest achievements. The firm ceased to operate after the brothers died.

TONY BACON

Larsson, Lars-Erik (Vilner) (b Åkarp, Skåne, 15 May 1908; d Helsingborg, 26 Dec 1986). Swedish composer. After taking the organist's examination in Växjö (1924), he studied at the Stockholm Conservatory (1925–9) with Ernst Ellberg for composition and Olallo Morales for conducting. While still a student he attracted attention with En spelmans jordafärd (1928) and his First Symphony (1927–8), and in 1929 he received a state composer's grant. In 1929–30 he made a study trip to Vienna and Leipzig, taking lessons from Berg and Fritz Reuter, and in 1930–31 he was a coach at the Royal Theatre, Stockholm. He then taught music in Malmö and Lund and was music critic of the Lunds Dagblad (1933–7). His Sinfonietta, performed at the 1934 ISCM Festival, brought him international recognition and contributed to his growing reputation in the 1930s. He worked for Swedish radio as a conductor, composer and producer (1937–43); from 1945 to 1947 he was supervisor of the non-professional symphony orchestras, and he remained conductor of the radio chamber orchestra until 1953. He was also professor of composition at the Stockholm Conservatory (1947–59) and later director of music at Uppsala University (1961–6). In 1971 he retired to Helsingborg.

As a composer Larsson continually oscillated between Nordic Romanticism, neo-classicism and more unconventional styles (serialism and polytonality). His first works are Sibelian, but his year abroad (1929–30) brought a change: the Ten Two-Part Piano Pieces (1932) include the first examples of 12-note technique in Swedish music, and a string quartet fragment of the same period is in a harsh tonal style reminiscent of Hindemith. Of much greater importance, however, is the Sinfonietta for strings (also 1932), a quite un-Romantic, contrapuntal piece with neo-Baroque motivic work in the outer movements; for a composer of Larsson's gentle lyrical disposition it is a work of biting aggressiveness. It was followed by a series of successful and entertaining pieces in an increasingly warm, elegant neo-classical style, the Concert Overture no.2 (1934), the Saxophone Concerto (1934), the Little Serenade for strings (1934), the Divertimento no.2 (1935) and the much performed Piano Sonatina no.1 (1936). Works on a larger scale met with less success: both the Second Symphony (1936–7) and the monumental opera Princessen av Cypern ('The Princess from Cyprus', 1930–37) were criticized for their mixture of styles, lack of originality and weak ideas, and they were withdrawn, though the symphony was performed again after revision in the 1970s.

Larsson's appointment to the radio service brought another change, and until the mid-1940s he concentrated exclusively on music for broadcasting, the theatre and films. Together with the poet Hjalmar Gullberg he developed a new type of radio programme, the 'lyrical suite', consisting of poetry readings interspersed with music. His works in this form included Dagens stunder (1938), from which the Pastoralsvit was compiled for concert performance, Senhöstblad (1938), which produced the Intima miniatyrer for string quartet, and Förklädd gud ('The Disguised God', 1940), a more cantata-like piece. In all of these, and particularly in the slower sections, there is a warm Scandinavian Romanticism, though the lively movements still show the airy, witty elegance of Larsson's neo-classicism. During the war years he also wrote works of contemporary relevance, most notably the Obligationsmarschen (1940), which, in a Norwegian version, played a part in encouraging the resistance movement in Norway.

A return to substantial independent composition came with the First String Quartet (1944) and the Third Symphony (1944–5). In the Cello Concerto (1947) there was another change of direction, best demonstrated in the Musik för orkester (1948–9), one of Larsson's weightiest works. It represents an unconscious approach to Hindemith: there are polytonal tendencies, thematic metamorphosis is used without schematicism on an extended scale and the ideas have a new depth and tension. This direction was continued in the Violin Concerto (1952) and in the 12 concertinos for solo instrument and strings (1953–7), a group designed for skilled amateurs and comparable with Larsson's neo-classical works.

In the late 1950s, Larsson again reviewed his style. There had been 12-note suggestions in the Kyrie of his Missa brevis (1954), and he now developed his own 12-note technique, based not on series but on 'interval piles' (four of three notes separated by a major 3rd, or three of four notes separated by a minor 3rd). The few works written in this manner, including the Adagio for strings (1960), the Three Orchestral Pieces (1960) and the Orchestral Variations (1962–3), display an introspective, austere character. Larsson then moved in the opposite direction with the colourful cantata Soluret och urnan ('The Sundial and the Urn', 1966) and the Lyrisk fantasi for orchestra (1966). He returned again to neo-classicism in a series of lesser chamber pieces, and in the orchestral Due auguri (1971) and Råå-rokoko (1973) he brought together learning and humour in subtle musical witticism. His last major work, Musica permutatio (1980), is a cool, enigmatic return to his counterpoint of the early 1960s, but without using 12-note technique.

GÖRAN BERGENDAL

LaRue, (Adrian) Jan (Pieters) (b Kisaran, Sumatra, Indonesia, 31 July 1918). American musicologist. He took the SB at Harvard in 1940. He began graduate work at Princeton, where he studied with Roger Sessions and Oliver Strunk and received the MFA in 1942. Returning to Harvard for additional studies, he took courses with Walter Piston, A. Tillman Merritt and Archibald T. Davison; he received the PhD at Harvard in 1952 with a dissertation on Okinawan Classical Songs. He taught at Wellesley College from 1942 to 1943 and 1946 to 1957. He was a professor in the music department at New York University from 1957; he was appointed chairman in 1971. He was chairman of the American Musicological Society from 1966 to 1968. He retired in 1988.

LaRue has done research in both ethnomusicology and historical musicology. His more recent interests include late 18th-century music, style analysis and tools of research, including watermark analysis, study of publishers' catalogues and computer applications in musicology. He has sought to combine and relate these interests through such projects as computer-aided preparation of thematic catalogues and use of the computer for problems of analysis. His examinations of 18th-century publishers' catalogues have furnished information concerning dating of publications, musical tastes and the speed with which music prints became available throughout Europe. His book on style analysis provides both a methodology and a system of analytical symbols for the student. He was the editor of the Wellesley Edition (Wellesley, MA, 1950–75).

PAULA MORGAN

La Rue [de Platea, de Robore, de Vico, vander Straeten], Pierre [Perison, Peteren, Petrus, Pierchon, Pieter, Pirson] de (b ?Tournai, *c*1452; d Kortrijk, 20 Nov 1518). Franco-Flemish composer. He was one of the most important composers of the late 15th and early 16th centuries, with an extensive and varied output in all major genres of his time.

1. Life. 2. Works: (i) Sources and chronology (ii) Masses and mass movements (iii) Other sacred music (iv) Secular music. 3. Reputation and significance.

1. Life. The son of Jehan de la Rue and Gertrud de la Haye, La Rue was almost certainly born in Tournai and educated in the city cathedral's maîtrise. He is first mentioned, as an adult professional singer, in the records of the cathedral of Ste Gudule in Brussels for 1469/70. This reference, together with the fact that his mother survived him, suggests a birthdate about 1452. He next appears at the Jacobskerk, Ghent, in the account book for 1471/2; other early employment was at Onze Lieve Vrouwkerk, Nieuwpoort (1472/3 to before 1477/8), the church of St Ode (location and date undetermined), an unidentified institution in Cologne (to 1489) and possibly Cambrai Cathedral. The 'Misser Piero delapiazza' in Siena thought by Staehelin to be La Rue refers to another musician; so far no evidence places the composer in Italy, making him one of the few major composers of his time not to visit there.

La Rue left Cologne in 1489 for employment at the Confraternity of Our Lady in 's-Hertogenbosch, where he stayed until 1492. In November of that year, after a gap of up to nine months unaccounted for, he joined the Habsburg-Burgundian chapel, where he was to spend the rest of his professional life; claims as to earlier court associations are based on misreadings of the documents. He served each successive ruler of the court beginning with Maximilian and travelled extensively in the court entourage. Under Maximilian's son Philip the Fair he made two trips to Spain, the first from 1501 to 1503 (through France to Spain, then back north by way of Habsburg lands) and the second by sea in 1506; bad weather and shipwreck forced a three-month stay in England at the court of Henry VII. Though many chapel members left Spain upon Philip's death in September 1506, La Rue and others remained there in the service of Juana, Philip's widow. After power was wrested from Juana in 1508 La Rue returned north, where in the previous year Philip's sister Marguerite of Austria had assumed the regency of the Low Countries for her young nephew, the future Charles V. In 1516, a year after Charles came of age, La Rue retired to Kortrijk, possibly to avoid another trip to Spain. He drew up his will on 16 June of the same year and died there in 1518.

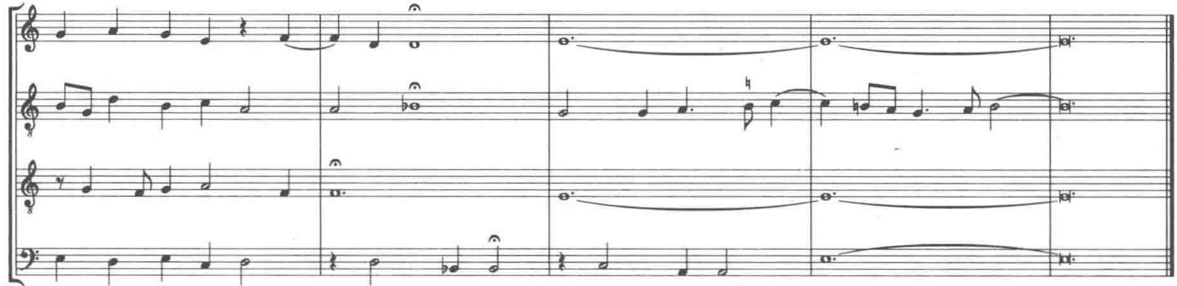
Despite considerable gaps in the early years, La Rue's life is thus unusually well-documented and for the most part demonstrates a continual search for better-paid and more prestigious employment, culminating in his membership in one of the largest and most illustrious musical institutions of the time. His longevity at the court is in contrast to the peripatetic lives of his major contemporaries, but certainly the richness of the musical life (colleagues at various times included Agricola, Weerbeke, de Orto, Champion and Divitis) as well as the professional security were reasons to remain. Evidently La Rue gradually assumed a quasi-official status as court composer and probably influenced the compilation of the many musical manuscripts emanating from the court scriptorium, possibly even sometimes acting as scribe. He was rewarded by valuable prebends at St Aubain, Namur, Onze Lieve Vrouwkerk, Kortrijk (where he ultimately retired), Onze Lieve Vrouwkerk, Dendermonde, and St Faraïlde (Sente Verle), Ghent; with the added income from the prebend at St Ode, received before he joined the court, he died a wealthy man.

2. Works.

(i) Sources and chronology. Sources for La Rue's music began appearing in the late 15th century and continued until 1617. His lengthy association with the Habsburg-Burgundian court resulted in the transmission of his music throughout Europe, not only through the court's many travels but also through the extensive series of manuscripts prepared by the scriptorium associated with the court. More than 50 such manuscripts survive today, prepared between the late 15th century and 1534 when the principal scribe Pierre Alamire retired. La Rue is by far the best-represented composer in this complex (see Kellman); five manuscripts are exclusively devoted to his works, with another five each containing only a single work by another composer. His music dominates B-Br 228 and plays a significant role in I-Fc 2439 (two major court chansonniers). As a result we have a series of authenticated works unique for a major composer of his generation; problems of authorship are less pressing than for his contemporaries, though some still remain. In addition, the court was not the only place where La Rue's music was cultivated; many manuscripts prepared elsewhere (especially Germany), as well as numerous prints beginning with the Odhecaton, disseminated his compositions across the continent. Petrucci devoted one of his earliest mass prints (1503) to La Rue and included his masses and a motet in several anthologies, while Antico, Giunta, Petreius and Formschneider also published complete masses.



Despite the excellent source situation for La Rue's music, a chronology remains difficult to construct; firm dates of composition exist for very few pieces. By and large his music seems to follow the general trends of the time – masses in earlier sources are more likely to progress in each movement from perfect to imperfect tempus, for example – but stylistic considerations alone are insufficient to place each work. One might expect the six-voice Credo to be a late work, for example, yet it appears in one of the earliest manuscripts to transmit his music.

Staehelin's suggestion that La Rue composed only during the last 20 or so years of his life seems unlikely in view of the revised birth-date, which makes him about 40 at the time of his court recruitment. But it remains possible that most of what survives dates from his court years; certain aspects of his output suggest a slightly later period of composition than the works of his contemporaries: the number of pieces – especially masses – for more than four voices, the relatively limited use of strict cantus-firmus procedure or fixed forms, the interest in parody. At the same time his intense interest in Marian-inspired works may stem initially from his employment at the Marian brotherhood in 's-Hertogenbosch.

(ii) Masses and mass movements. La Rue was one of the most prolific mass composers of his generation. 29 of his masses circulated with ascriptions in Habsburg-Burgundian manuscripts; another work, Missa 'Jesum liate', was in a now-lost manuscript belonging to Philip II. Missa 'Sancta dei genitrix', despite a garbled attribution in its sole court source, is surely La Rue's as well. Two other masses, Missa 'L'homme armé' (ii) and Missa sine nomine (ii), are anonymous in their sources (manuscripts likewise from the court scriptorium) but are usually considered to be La Rue's. The anonymous Missa de septem doloribus for four voices (also in a Habsburg-Burgundian manuscript), on the other hand, seems unlikely to be genuine. This leaves undecided only the Missa 'Fortuna desperata' attributed to 'Periquin' in its unique source.

In contrast to his contemporaries, La Rue drew relatively little on secular models for his masses, using only Urrede's villancico Nunca fué pena mayor (ex.1), his own chansons Tous les regretz and Incessament mon pauvre cueur lamente, the popular melodies L'homme armé and Tandernaken, possibly a German tune (in Missa Almana), and perhaps the Italian song Fortuna desperata. More often he turned to chant models, a number of which remain unidentified. In one unusual composition, the Missa de Sancto Job, the chants are drawn from their appearance in Pipelare's Missa Floruit egregius rather than from original sources (see Bloxam, 1991). La Rue used the motet Ave sanctissima Maria (probably his own) as the basis for one work, and a few masses (the Sine nomine works and the canonic Missa 'O salutaris hostia') appear to be completely free. Particularly striking is his practice in certain masses of quoting from a completely separate work at a single point in the cycle: the final Agnus Dei of Missa 'Ave sanctissima Maria' uses an unidentified O dulcis amica Dei melody, the Credo of Missa 'Sancta dei genitrix' includes part of the L'homme armé tune, the second 'Osanna' of the five-voice Missa de septem doloribus quotes the superius of the concluding phrase of Josquin's Ave Maria, and the final Agnus Dei of Missa 'L'homme armé' (i) cites the popular song Tant que nostre argent dura. In a related vein, the 'Pleni' of Missa de sancta cruce owes much to the second Agnus Dei of Josquin's Missa 'L'ami baudichon'. La Rue's Missa de Beata Virgine, Missa de feria, Missa de Sancto Job, Missa de septem doloribus, Missa Pascale and Requiem Mass all draw on multiple chants, making him one of the composers most sympathetic to this practice. Finally, in part because he used polyphonic head-motifs in some masses, several scholars have suggested unidentified polyphonic models for some works (e.g. Missa 'Alleluia').

La Rue wrote two ostinato masses, Missa 'Cum iocunditate' and Missa 'Sancta dei genitrix', and two that are completely canonic: Missa 'O salutaris hostia', in which a single notated voice generates three others, and Missa 'Ave sanctissima Maria', whose six voices are generated by three two-voice canons as in the motet on which it is based. In the other masses La Rue rarely followed strict cantus-firmus procedure, preferring instead to embellish his models and integrate the borrowed material throughout the texture, making him of singular importance in the history of the paraphrase mass. He is also a composer of crucial significance in the early parody or 'imitation' mass. Both his Missa 'Nuncqua fué pena mayor' (a cantus-firmus mass with extensive ancillary borrowings from the polyphonic model) and his eight-voice Credo 'Angeli archangeli' (based on Isaac's six-voice motet) point the way towards the full-fledged parody technique he employed in three masses, Missa 'Tous les regretz', Missa 'Incessament mon pauvre cueur lamente', and Missa 'Ave sanctissima Maria'. These masses are noteworthy not only because two of them use secular models but also because La Rue turned exclusively to his own pieces as sources for inspiration. Further, they solve a series of compositional problems of increasing difficulty: Missa 'Tous les regretz', for four voices, is based on a straightforward rondeau cinquain; Missa 'Incessament', for five voices, has a two-voice canon as its foundation throughout, as does its model; Missa 'Ave sanctissima Maria', for six voices, is completely canonic, its triple canons matching those of its model. La Rue is alone among his contemporaries in displaying so much interest in this newest type of mass.

La Rue typically wrote for equal voices and constantly varied his texture within individual movements. Like Josquin, he was extremely fond of paired voices, and used them frequently to provide contrast and lighten the texture. He made use of both homophonic sections and non-imitative polyphony, but imitative writing is by far the most common texture, with melodic entries occurring at times on unusual intervals. He is widely recognized for his contrapuntal mastery, and his masses demonstrate numerous instances of strict canonic writing. In addition to the two completely canonic works cited above, three others are based on a structural foundation of two voices in canon: Missa de feria, Missa 'Incessament', and Missa 'L'homme armé' (ii). Five more masses contain one or more canon-based or totally canonic sections. Perhaps the most interesting of this last group are the canons found in Missa 'L'homme armé' (i), where each of the three sections of the Kyrie has two voices in a mensuration canon, and where the second Agnus Dei is a mensuration canon in which all four voices are derived from one – in all probability La Rue was attempting to surpass the second Agnus Dei of Josquin's Missa 'L'homme armé' super voces musicales.

La Rue's love of variety is also evident in his treatment of melodic material, both borrowed material and that of his own invention. Varied repetition is the norm; the constantly changing rhythms of the ostinato in Missa 'Cum iocunditate' are a good example of his reluctance to use exact repetition. La Rue was also fond of melodies that keep circling gracefully back to the same pitch, approaching it in continually shifting ways. He frequently played with motifs that thoroughly explore a limited range in this manner, often using syncopated rhythms. Motifs are often inspired by specific intervals that then pervade the melody, and individual lines are at times composed of a string of related ideas. These types of writing provide a subtle yet satisfying sense of unification. For contrast La Rue sometimes wrote wide-ranging lines, melodies employing large leaps, and phrases that immediately repeat themselves an octave higher. Other devices found in his music are sequences, ostinati (especially in the lowest voice) and passages in parallel 3rds or 6ths.

Two Kyries and five independent Credos are usually considered La Rue's (the five-voice Kyrie is anonymous in its two sources, both from the court, but has never been seriously questioned). Two of these movements are evidently free, while three draw on liturgically appropriate chant (one in a Credo de villagiis). Another Credo uses the monophonic song L'amour du moy, freely treated, while the extended eight-voice Credo 'Angeli archangeli' borrows from Isaac's motet both polyphonically and monophonically (the tenor of Binchois' Comme femme as used by Isaac). The six-voice Credo, evidently an early work, is La Rue's only composition for so many voices that does not employ canon.

(iii) Other sacred music. La Rue's motets are less well represented than the masses in court sources. 13 of 25 surviving works appear with attributions in court manuscripts; six works circulate only in non-court sources, often posthumous German prints (though a number of 'motets' in these sources are actually contrafacta of mass movements and chansons; see Davison, 1962). Of the other half dozen, all anonymous in court collections, two are ascribed to La Rue elsewhere, while the remaining four (including O salutaris hostia, which takes the place of the first Osanna in all sources of Missa de Sancta Anna) have been attributed to La Rue by modern scholars only. Of this last group, the most dramatic reattribution is that for Absalon fili mi; van Benthem and Rifkin independently gave reasons for moving its authorship from Josquin to La Rue (for opposing arguments see Milsom, 1993, and Davison, 1996; for support see Meconi, 1998).

The stylistic traits of La Rue's masses carry over into his motets, with continued interest in strict canon. Three motets are totally canonic (Ave sanctissima Maria, six voices derived from three two-voice canons; Da pacem domine, four voices derived from two; and Salve regina (i), four derived from one) while two others add a free voice or voices to a canonic foundation (Laudate Dominum and Pater de coelis, Deus). 16 motets are in two or more sections, and they range in length from the brief O salutaris hostia (34 breves) to the massive Salve mater salvatoris (300 breves). Almost all the works are for four voices; the few exceptions are all unusual in other ways as well (Ave sanctissima Maria and Pater de coelis, Deus employ canon, Maria mater gratie/Fors seulement uses a voice from Ockeghem's chanson, and both Sancta Maria virgo and Si dormiero are sacred tricinia).

Somewhat more than half the motets use (or appear to use) pre-existing material; although this is usually the same chant that supplies the text for the derived work, La Rue borrowed on one occasion from Ockeghem and, in Salve regina (iv), from both Du Fay's Par le regard and Binchois's Je ne vis oncques la pareille. As in the masses, some models elude identification (such as that for Sancta Maria virgo), and the impetus behind certain possibly occasional compositions (e.g. Quis dabit pacem) remains obscure. More than half the motets have Marian themes, and the presence of six Salve regina settings is particularly striking. Only two psalm motets (possibly late works) survive, neither in a court source.

La Rue also wrote a complete set of Magnificat settings on every tone, apparently the first composer to do so. The setting for the third tone is now unfortunately lost; the surviving ones all set even verses only. These are well-authenticated, all but one appearing with attribution in court manuscripts. The set of Lamentations attributed to La Rue in a late German print, however, is more likely to be by Stephan Mahu.

(iv) Secular music. Recent stylistic analysis has eliminated many secular works previously considered to be La Rue's (see Meconi, 1986), but suggestions that anonymous pieces should be attributed to him are swelling the corpus anew. Two dozen works with contemporary ascriptions remain, all but one transmitted in court chansonniers; modern scholars have attributed to La Rue another 22 anonymous compositions found in court manuscripts. Of the unquestioned two dozen, most are for four voices, with three for three voices and another four for five voices. Because the bulk of La Rue's chansons appear to have been written later than those of Agricola and Compère, his works are in general more forward-looking, and they constitute an important portion of the pre-'Parisian' repertoire. Only three of the attributed chansons, A vous non autre, Ce n'est pas jeu and De l'oeil de la fille du roy, are in the formes fixes (all rondeaux), and all are likely to be early compositions. One work is strophic: Pour ung jamais on a text by Marguerite of Austria. Other works set poems that may be rondeau refrains for which additional text is unknown, but it is unclear what La Rue's intentions were. In some instances (e.g. Tous nobles cueurs), full text exists, but the music precludes performance as a fully-texted rondeau. Free works are usually through-composed but sometimes involve the repetition of an earlier section of music (e.g. Mijn hert).

La Rue made relatively little use of borrowed material in his secular music; even the two works in the style of four-part arrangements (Autant en emporte le vent and Dedans bouton) avoid the use of popular melodies. His ventures into the genre of art-song reworkings all draw on models by Ockeghem (D'ung aultre aymer, Ma bouche rit and Fors seulement, the last inspiring one sacred and two secular settings by La Rue). His motet-chanson Plorer, gemir, crier/Requiem, which uses the introit for the Requiem Mass, is likely to be in commemoration of the older composer as well.

La Rue's secular works demonstrate the same stylistic traits as his sacred ones, with however considerably less interest in homophony and somewhat less use of canon. Only one chanson, En espoir vis, is completely canonic (two two-voice canons). Three of the five-voice chansons (Cent mille regretz, Incessament mon pauvre cueur lamente and one of the Fors seulement settings) are based on a strict canon between the two lowest voices, a procedure evidently unique to La Rue (see Bernstein). Inclusion of the anonymous chansons proposed by modern scholars augments rather than changes the formal and stylistic picture sketched above, adding six rondeaux, two more chant-based motet-chansons (one of which is also a rondeau), a canon for six voices derived from three two-voice canons, five works adding free voices to a canonic foundation, one piece based on a monophonic song, and several free compositions.

3. Reputation and significance. La Rue was cited in Molinet's famous déploration on the death of Ockeghem, Nymphes des bois (set by Josquin), and appeared regularly thereafter in literary and theoretical lists of noteworthy composers, including the foreword to Monteverdi's fifth book of madrigals. Praised by Glarean, Martin Luther, Zarlino and many others, his music enjoyed a special vogue in Germany after his death, prompting misattributions similar to those for Josquin, if not so extensive. Modern scholars have noted his significance for more than two centuries – Burney published the Benedictus from Missa de Beata Virgine – yet the lack of a complete critical edition has severely hindered attempts to evaluate and understand La Rue's work as well as its influence on subsequent composers. He is perhaps best known as a composer of canons, and certainly the frequency of strict canon in his output is surpassed only by Josquin among composers of his generation. Yet there is considerably more to his music. His tendency to paraphrase and integrate melodic lines, whether original or borrowed, creates tightly unified compositions; his mastery of textural variety generates continual aural interest. Although usually considered a composer only peripherally concerned with textual meaning, La Rue wrote several works that display considerable rhetorical power, including Pourquoy non and Considera Israel; in the latter work the switch to a series of repeated breves in the top voice for the words 'non sunt divisi' is but one of several examples of clear word-painting in his music. Further, the use of homophonic and syllabic sections to emphasize specific phrases is frequent in his compositions.

La Rue expanded the contemporary sound-world in several significant ways. He used signed accidentals to a greater degree than his contemporaries, going as far as D♭ in Pourquoy non and G♭ in Absalon fili mi, where this employment of flats is one argument in favour of his authorship. He also employed extremely low ranges more frequently than any contemporary or predecessor. About two-thirds of the masses extend below the gamut, eleven of these to E, D, C, or even B♭; similar instances of writing for extremely low voices occur in both the motets and chansons. La Rue also had a distinctive style of dissonance and harmonic relations, with a high tolerance for parallel perfect intervals and casual dissonances. While certain of his pieces seem to lack a coherent tonal plan, others display striking and clearly intentional harmonic shifts (ex.1). Despite differences in style, La Rue's music was probably most strongly influenced by that of Josquin, which he certainly knew; he may even have met the composer himself during the court's travels. In any event, there are curious parallels between the works of the two that, combined with La Rue's borrowings from Josquin, suggest that La Rue felt a rivalry even if Josquin did not.

Several of La Rue's compositions served as models for his contemporaries and successors, and according to one early source he was even considered (probably erroneously) the composer of the famous and much-borrowed Een vrolic wesen. His single authenticated Flemish work, Mijn hert, inspired a group of derivative settings, and the second section of Sancta Maria virgo was reworked by Craen in Ecce video. Gascongne used both Mijn hert and Pourquoy non as models for parody Masses, while La Rue's Missa de feria may have inspired Févin's. Other instances of direct borrowing may come to light as La Rue's work becomes better known. A more general influence will probably be found in the succeeding generation of northern composers, including Gombert, Richafort and Manchicourt.

His significance for now thus rests on the quantity, type and quality of his compositions as well as a number of historic firsts. Among his peers, only Josquin, Isaac and Mouton surpassed him in sheer number of works. Taken as a whole, his output presents a liturgical completeness of a kind unequalled among his contemporaries: a set of masses for the most important Marian feasts, another series of miscellaneous Marian masses, masses for the dead, the blessed sacrament, the holy cross, Christmas, Easter and daily use, a complete Magnificat cycle and settings of three of the four most important Marian antiphons, including an astonishing six versions of Salve regina. His Requiem Mass is among the earliest polyphonic treatments to survive, his Magnificat cycle was apparently the first ever composed, his Missa 'Ave sanctissima Maria' is possibly the earliest six-voice mass and certainly the first wholly canonic one, and he was a pioneer in writing full-fledged parody masses. He is important as well in the history of the paraphrase mass and the turn-of-the century chanson. In respect of the quality and inventiveness of his music, he was second only to Josquin among the composers of his generation.

HONEY MECONI

La Rue, Robert de (fl *c*1530–50). French composer. He was master of the boys at Meaux in June 1533, when he was unsuccessfully recruited for the same post at Notre Dame, Paris. Five chansons in Parisian printed anthologies between 1536 and 1554, ascribed to 'La Rue' or 'De la Rue', are almost certainly by Robert rather than his more famous namesake PIERRE DE LA RUE.

HONEY MECONI

Laruette [La Ruette], Jean-Louis (b Paris, 7 March 1731, d Paris, 10 Jan 1792). French haute-contre and composer. He first became known as a singer in the Théâtres de la Foire, where he made his début in September 1752, shortly after Monnet opened the Théâtre de la Foire St-Laurent. He was thus one of the first to perform in opéras comiques mêlés d'ariettes at a time when librettists were mingling vaudevilles and parodies of Italian arias; his most important such role was probably the part of the Magician in Sedaine's Le diable à quatre (1756). His first ventures into composition are harder to date because the arrangers of pasticcios and vaudevilles generally remained anonymous; however, pieces attributed to him are the final vaudeville of Parmentier's Le plaisir et l'innocence (14 August 1753), a new air in Louis Anseaume and Farin de Hautemer's Le boulevard (24 August 1753) and the final quartet of Anseaume and P.A.L. de Marcouville's La fausse aventurière (22 March 1757). The nature of his contributions to Anseaume and Marcouville's Les amants trompés (1756) and Sedaine's Le diable à quatre is uncertain. Laruette fully assumed the role of composer with Le docteur Sangrado, an opéra comique with ariettes and vaudevilles written jointly with Duni. His first important operas, Le médecin de l'amour, Cendrillon and L'ivrogne corrigé, owe much to their librettos, in which Anseaume contrived a skilful mixture of vaudevilles, ariettes and vocal ensembles. Laruette's last three operas, while musically more ambitious (they contain no vaudevilles at all) were less successful than his mixed-genre works – indeed, Le dépit généreux and Les deux compères were total failures.

Laruette also pursued a brilliant career as a singer; after playing such juvenile leads as Alberti in Duni's Le peintre amoureux de son modèle (1757) and Azor in his own Cendrillon, he specialized in the often unsympathetic parts of fathers and financiers, for instance Monsieur Pince in Philidor's Blaise le savetier (1759). He and his wife, Marie-Thérèse (née Villette) (1744–1837), were among the five members of the Opéra-Comique company authorized to join the Comédie-Italienne in 1762, and he contributed to the success of operas by Philidor (he sang Blifil in Tom Jones) and Grétry (as Cassandre in Le tableau parlant). Laruette retired from the Comédie-Italienne in March 1778, and thereafter sang only in concerts and at the Théâtre des Beaujolais, as a printed score of Anfossi and Cambini's Le tuteur avare, 1787, shows. His high voice was not particularly attractive, but his acting ability and the care composers took in writing music for him made him one of the most popular singers of his time. His name remained linked to a type of opéra-comique role which persisted until the end of the 19th century.

Laruette belonged to the first generation of French composers of opéra comique in the sense that term assumed during the 1750s under the influence of the intermèdes performed in Paris by the Bouffons. However, he never embraced the Italian opera buffa style, although his work does contain a few examples, such as Jacqueline's ariette 'De la médecine' in Le docteur Sangrado and the trio 'Sotte carogne' in L'ivrogne corrigé. These apart, he borrowed techniques directly from tragédie lyrique and opéra-ballet. His melodic writing is inseparable from its frequently lavish ornamentation, while the accompaniment displays a linear conception reminiscent of Rameau, although Laruette's harmony is less dissonant and his orchestral texture much less dense. Also French in style are his frequent recourse to dance metres, changes of time in recitatives and illustrative vocal writing of the kind found in the divertissements of grand opéra. The second act of L'ivrogne corrigé is very humorous, ushering in a series of pieces in which composers of opéra comique parody the serious style. Le guy de chesne is more in the pastoral tradition and, unusually, is set in pre-Roman Gaul.

Larway, J.H. English firm of music publishers. Taken over by EDWIN ASHDOWN.

LaSalle Quartet. American string quartet. It was formed in 1949 by students from the Juilliard School of Music. The first violinist, Walter Levin (b Berlin, 6 Dec 1924), studied with Galamian at Juilliard; the second violinist, Henry Meyer (b Dresden, 29 June 1923), studied at the Prague Academy of Musical Arts, in Paris with George Enescu and René Benedetti, and with Galamian at Juilliard; the viola player, Peter Kamnitzer (b Berlin, 27 Nov 1922), studied at the Manhattan and Juilliard schools; the successive cellists were Richard Kapuscinski (1946–55), Jack Kirstein (1955–75) and Lee Fiser (b Portland, OR, 26 April 1947), who joined the quartet in 1975 and studied at the Cleveland Institute and was a member of the Cincinnati SO up to 1975. The ensemble was quartet-in-residence at Colorado College (1949–53), and then at the Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music, where all four members became professors (in October 1982 they gave a concert in Alice Tully Hall to celebrate the 30th year of their residency). The quartet made its European début in 1954 and toured extensively in the USA and abroad. It was dissolved in 1988. It performed works of all periods but was best known for its performances and recordings of Schoenberg, Berg and Webern, and the late quartets of Beethoven. Among the many composers who wrote music for the quartet are Hans Erich Apostel, Herbert Brün, Earle Brown, Henri Pousseur, Wolf Rosenberg, Kagel, Ligeti, Penderecki and Lutosławski. In 1958 the quartet acquired a matched set of Amati instruments: two violins by Nicolo (1648 and 1682), a viola by Antonio and Girolamo (1619), and a cello by Nicolo (1670). Although the LaSalle Quartet was associated mainly with 20th-century music, its playing of it was not archetypally 'modern'. Rather it was compounded of tonal richness (with pronounced vibrato), broad tempos and, at all times, linear clarity. In its famous performances and recordings of the works of the Second Viennese School, the quartet projected the essence of the music's 'modernity' while at the same time exposing its roots in 19th-century Romanticism.

Lascelles, George Henry Hubert. See HAREWOOD.

Lasceux, Guillaume (b Poissy, 3 Feb 1740; d Paris, 1831). French organist and composer. He began his career as an organist at the church of St Martin in the village of Chevreuse, near Poissy, at the age of 18. He went to Paris in 1762 and spent five years studying composition with the organist Charles Noblet, who was also harpsichordist of the Opéra. In 1769 he became supernumerary organist to Claude-Nicolas Ingrain at St Etienne-du-Mont and took over the post in 1774. Other positions which he held simultaneously were at the church of the Mathurins (from 1769, succeeding Noblet), St Aure (from 1769), the Minims convent in the Place Royale (from 1779), Collège de Navarre and Séminaire St Magloire. As a result of the Revolution he lost his patronage and most of his organ positions and then, in order to support himself, played for the services of the Theophilanthropists in St Etienne-du-Mont (renamed Temple de la Piété-filiale). When St Etienne-du-Mont was restored to Roman Catholic worship in 1803 he resumed his former duties until he retired on 2 January 1819.

Lasceux was known as a virtuoso organist, and was particularly celebrated for his improvisations depicting the Last Judgment. He composed in many genres, including opéras comiques, accompanied keyboard sonatas, sacred organ pieces and vocal music, and made keyboard arrangements of popular songs. The novelty of his works gained them some success, particularly with amateurs.

EILEEN MORRIS GUENTHER

Laschi [Mombelli], Luisa (b Florence, 1760s; *d c*1790). Italian soprano. Her first known appearances were in 1782 in Vicenza and Bologna. She made her Viennese début on 24 September 1784 in Cimarosa's Giannina e Bernardone. The Wiener Kronik said: 'she has a beautiful clear voice, which in time will become rounder and fuller; she is very musical, sings with more expression than the usual opera singers and has a beautiful figure! Madam Fischer (Storazi [i.e. Nancy Storace]) has only more experience, and is otherwise in no way superior to Dem Laschi'. On 21 January 1785 Laschi replaced Storace, who was about to give birth, as Rosina in Paisiello's Il barbiere di Siviglia 'very well, and was much applauded' (Zinzendorf). She left at Easter for an engagement in Naples – where she met her future husband, the tenor Domenico Mombelli (1751–1835) – but returned to Vienna at Easter 1786. There, on 1 May 1786, she created the role of the Countess in Le nozze di Figaro. She had a further success on 15 May in Anfossi's Il trionfo delle donne. On 1 August she appeared, probably for the first time in Vienna with Mombelli, in Sarti's I finti eredi. On 29 September the emperor wrote to his chamberlain Count Rosenberg, with a jocular reference to Figaro: 'The marriage between Laschi and Mombelli may take place without waiting for my return, and I cede to you le droit de Seigneur'. In November 1786 she created the role of Queen Isabella in Martín y Soler's Una cosa rara, and in 1787 created Cupid in his L'arbore di Diana, a role that required her to appear alternately as a shepherdess and as Cupid. A contemporary reviewer described her portrayal: 'Grace personified . . .; ah, who is not enchanted by it, what painter could better depict the arch smile, what sculptor the grace in all her gestures, what singer could match the singing, so melting and sighing, with the same naturalness and true, warm expression?'

In January 1788 she appeared in the première of Salieri's Axur re d'Ormus and in May sang Zerlina in the first Vienna performance of Mozart's Don Giovanni; Mozart composed a new duet to be sung by her and Benucci. She was already seven months pregnant but continued singing until the day before her confinement and reappeared four weeks later. But there were difficulties between the Italian company and the management and the emperor gave the Mombellis notice. In September Luisa created the role of Carolina in Salieri's Il talismano and in February 1789 she made her farewell appearance as Donna Farinella in L'ape musicale; nothing further seems to be known about her, but in 1791 Domenico, apparently a widower, married the ballerina Vincenza Viganò, by whom he had 12 children.

CHRISTOPHER RAEBURN

Laserna, Blas de (b Corella, Navarra, bap. 4 Feb 1751; d Madrid, 8 Aug 1816). Spanish composer. At 23 he began his career as a theatrical composer in Madrid and by 1776 his fame was such that the impresario Eusebio Ribera contracted him to write 63 tonadillas every year. In 1773 he married the daughter of the Madrid organist Vicente Adán. Widowed in 1795, he next married the singer María Pupillo, who died in 1809. In 1790 he succeeded Esteve as conductor at the Teatro de la Cruz, remaining there until 1808. Despite being one of the most prolific composers of his time, he was constantly underpaid and after 1800 had to resort to menial copying and teaching to secure a livelihood.
